The Century Book of the American Revolution

Issued under the Empire State Soc'y American Auspices of the Sons of the Revolution

Line of the Minute Men
April 19, 1775
Stand your ground
Don't fire unless fired upon
But if they mean to have a war
Let it begin here

By Elbridge S. Brooks
CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

GIFT OF
Margaret C. Hall
in memory of
Dr. Edward F. Hall
(Class of 1924)
The original of this book is in the Cornell University Library.

There are no known copyright restrictions in the United States on the use of the text.

http://www.archive.org/details/cu31924051348559
Other books in the same series and by the same author.

THE CENTURY BOOK FOR YOUNG AMERICANS.
The Story of the Government.
Issued under the auspices of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution.
With introduction by GENERAL HORACE PORTER, President-General of the Society.

THE CENTURY BOOK OF FAMOUS AMERICANS.
The Story of a Young People's Pilgrimage to Historic Homes.
Issued under the auspices of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.
With introduction by MRS. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, President-General of the Society.

Uniform with this book in size and style. Each containing 300 pages and nearly as many illustrations. Price of each, $1.50.
THE BATTLE OF LEXINGTON.

FOUGHT "PATEROT'S DAY," APRIL 19, 1775. FROM THE PAINTING BY HENRY SAINDHAM, NOW IN THE CARY MEMORIAL BUILDING, LEXINGTON.
THE CENTURY BOOK OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

THE STORY OF THE PILGRIMAGE OF A PARTY OF YOUNG PEOPLE TO THE BATTLEFIELDS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

BY

ELBRIDGE S. BROOKS

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW

ILLUSTRATED

THE CENTURY CO., NEW YORK
INTRODUCTION

Office of the President of the Empire State Society,

A few years ago the suggestion was made to The Century Company by Mr. John Winfield Scott, a member of the Executive Committee of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, appointed a committee of one for the Executive Committee, that The Century Company should issue a book in which should be set forth in a manner attractive to young people “the principles contended for in the American Revolution, and a description of the institutions of the Government.” The result of this suggestion was embodied in “The Century Book for Young Americans,” the story of the trip of a party of young people to the city of Washington, written by Elbridge S. Brooks and richly illustrated from the great store of material which the publishers possessed. The book was issued in the autumn of 1894, indorsed by the National Society, and with an introduction by General Horace Porter, President-General. Its success has been great, both as a book for children at home and for supplemental reading in schools, and in 1896 it was followed by “The Century Book of Famous Americans,” written also by Mr. Brooks, telling of the adventures of the same young people and their well-posted uncle on a journey to the homes of historic Americans, Washington, Hamilton, Webster, Clay, Jefferson, Franklin, Lincoln, Grant, and others. It was issued under the auspices of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

The same publishers purpose offering to the public a volume in which the story of the American Revolution, from Lexington to Yorktown, shall be told in such a way as will interest young readers, and, at the same time, possess valuable information for old as well as young in its descriptions of the historic scenes made famous during the struggle of our forefathers for their independence. The book will have a living and personal interest because it takes the form of a journey to each of these historic places by the same party of young people and their guide. The illustrations, which include many photographs taken especially for this book, will add both to the attractiveness and the value of the work.

The Empire State Society of the Sons of the American Revolution is not responsible for the statements in the book and has no pecuniary interest in its publication.

Individually, I take pleasure in commending the volume both in its scope and execution.

Chauncey M. Depew, President.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>I</th>
<th>IN CAMBRIDGE WITH PATRIOTS AND POETS</th>
<th>1</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>A Visit to Cambridge—Uncle Tom's Enthusiasm—Three Great Poets and Three Historic Houses—A City of Memorials—From the Vikings to the Boys in Blue—Uncle Tom's Suggestion—An Object-Lesson in America's Revolutionary Story.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II</td>
<td>ON LEXINGTON COMMON</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III</td>
<td>AMONG THE EMBATTLED FARMERS</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>How They Came to Concord—Dr. Prescott's Ride—Where the Congress Met—At Concord Fight—The Old Monument—The Statue of the Minute-man—The Story of the Retreat—Dr. Hale's Poem—Sites and Scenes in a Famous Old Town.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV</td>
<td>ON BUNKER HILL</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Climbing the Monument—The View from the Top—Tracing the Battle-ground—The Redoubt—Colonel Prescott—Warren and Putnam—The Story of the Assault—Victory or Defeat?—Webster’s Oration—The Tablet on Dorchester Heights—The First American Victory.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V</td>
<td>IN GREATER NEW YORK</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VI</td>
<td>ALONG THE DELAWARE</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Where Washington Crossed—The Wintry March—The Dash on Trenton—A Turning Point in the War—Princeton's Battle-ground—In “The Lair of the Tiger!”</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VII</td>
<td>On the Schuylkill and Thereabouts</td>
<td>115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------</td>
<td>----------------------------------</td>
<td>-----</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>By Brandywine Creek — Old-time Obstacles — The Fight at the Ford and on the Hill — Where Lafayette was Wounded — The Chew House — The Street Fight at Germantown — A Baffling Fog — At Valley Forge — An Object-lesson in Self-sacrifice — At Monmouth Court-house — The Monument at Freehold — A Gallant Foeman.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>VIII</th>
<th>Up the Hudson</th>
<th>139</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>IX</th>
<th>Promenading with Burgoyne</th>
<th>159</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>At the Springs — Burgoyne’s Promenade — Oriskany and Bennington — Schuyler and Gates — The “Lone Tree” of Walloomsac — The Bennington Monument — Across Country to Schuylerville — Freeman’s Farms and Bemis Heights — The Saratoga Monument — The Vacant Niche — The Surrender Spot.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>X</th>
<th>From the Sea to the Sand-hills</th>
<th>175</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>By Sea to Savannah — Where the British Landed — The Siege of Savannah — A City of Monuments — Fascinating Charleston — The Defense of Fort Moultrie — The Battle of Eutaw Springs.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>XI</th>
<th>Among the Carolina Highlands</th>
<th>193</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>XII</th>
<th>In a Region of Rivers</th>
<th>211</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>XIII</th>
<th>On the Heights Above York</th>
<th>229</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Sun on the Monument — After Guilford — Marion’s Men — Cornwallis at Bay — The French Alliance — The Last Assault — The Surrender — Old Yorktown — Home Again.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
THE CENTURY BOOK OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION
"THE BROAD STONE SEAT OF THE LONGFELLOW MEMORIAL."

In the distance is seen Craigie House, which was Washington's headquarters and Longfellow's home.
THE CENTURY BOOK OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

CHAPTER I
IN CAMBRIDGE WITH PATRIOTS AND POETS

A Visit to Cambridge—Uncle Tom’s Enthusiasm—Three Great Poets and Three Historic Houses—A City of Memorials—From the Vikings to the Boys in Blue—Uncle Tom’s Suggestion—An Object-Lesson in America’s Revolutionary Story.

“WHAT a spot this is, boys and girls!” Uncle Tom Dunlap exclaimed, with an impressive sweep of the hand. “The atmosphere is fairly charged with patriotism; the air throbs with memories. I know of no spot in the whole country that is more absolutely a center of American interest than this old town of Cambridge. I know of none better calculated to make you young people proud of America and of what America has done.”

Uncle Tom spoke with more than his customary enthusiasm. It was evident that he felt all that he said.

He sat with his young people on the broad stone seat of the Longfellow Memorial in the old college town of Cambridge in Massachusetts. It was the same group of boys and girls that had gathered about him, as, on their personally conducted trip to Washington, he helped them study the government of the United States of America in its own house and home; it was the same group of eager young people that had taken, with him, the tour of inspection among the homes of great and famous Americans.

Once again they had all met in Boston—Jack and Marian Dunlap, their cousin, Albert Upham, and Marian’s “best friend,” Christine Bacon. Uncle Tom Dunlap, as usual, had taken charge of them, and that morning they had welcomed, at their hotel, their boy friend of the “Hub,” Roger Densmore.

Their first trip had been to Cambridge.

“We did n’t see half enough when we were there before,” Bert complained.

“That ’s so,” Roger admitted. “We ought to give more time to it.
There ’s lots to see there, you know; and besides, it ’s a good place to start from if you want to see more things. Is n’t that so, Uncle Tom?”

Uncle Tom emphatically indorsed this statement, and they were speedily flying in “the electrics” through that wonderful piece of modern engineering, the big underground “Subway,” out through Boston’s stately Back Bay, and across the graceful Harvard Bridge, to what Uncle Tom called “the classic shades” of Cambridge.

Roger, as a prospective Harvard boy, had been their guide through the beautiful University town; and even Jack, who was preparing for Yale, and Bert, whose educational future still lay unsettled between Princeton, Yale, and Cornell, were forced to admit that Harvard and its surroundings were, as Jack declared with characteristic emphasis, “Just great!”

Under Roger’s guidance they had “done” the colleges from the beautiful gates to the dormitories and the “gym,” from Memorial Hall to the Agassiz Museum, and from the Fogg Art Museum and the Library to the tennis-courts on Jarvis Field, the “tree” in the quadrangle where the class-day scramble is held, and—what especially interested the girls—the rounded walls of Radcliffe.

From here, after reading the tablet under the decrepit Washington elm, they had wandered up Brattle Street, and, entering the green little park known as the Longfellow Memorial, they had dropped upon its broad granite seat to rest and look about them.

Then it was that Uncle Tom uttered his exclamation. So suggestive was the spot that the boys and girls unconsciously echoed his sentiments; though Bert, ever ready with his query of investigation, tacked to his appreciative "that's so!" his inevitable "but why?"

"I'll tell you why, Mr. Bert," his uncle replied. "Stand up, all of you, while I box the patriotic compass. Before you, if certain over-confident antiquarians are to be believed, lie the beginnings of historic America."

"What! over there in the swamp?" asked Jack.

"The marsh, if you please, sir," corrected Roger. "The idea of calling Longfellow's beloved marshes a swamp!"
“Yes, there, through its marshes, winds the historic Charles River, upon whose banks, almost against the Cambridge Hospital yonder, Professor Horsford claimed to have discovered the cellar of Leif Ericson's fish-house—the first stone house, so he declared, built by Europeans in America, almost five hundred years before the caravels of Columbus tacked across the 'herring-pond.'”

“Leif Ericson!” exclaimed Marian. “Was n't his the beautiful statue we saw on Commonwealth Avenue?”

“Yes,” Uncle Tom assented.

“Oh, but he 's just a 'fake,'” Jack declared. “My teacher said so.”

“You don't really believe that story, do you, Uncle Tom?” queried Bert, with a tinge of skepticism.

“I 'll discuss that question with you later, boys—say at Norumbega Tower?” Uncle Tom replied, with a non-committal shrug.

“Oh! what 's Norumbega Tower?” Christine asked, attracted by the rhythm of the name.

“It 's a stone tower on the Charles River, ten miles above here,” Roger explained. “Professor Horsford put it up, on the very rocks which, so he said, were part of the fort and city of Norumbega, built by Leif Ericson the Norseman in the year one thousand and one. It 's an awfully nice place for a picnic, girls. And the canoeing!—well, you must just see it before you go home.”

“Which—the town or the canoeing?” laughed Marian.

“Both,” replied Roger, gallantly, “one is historic and you 'll make the other so.”

“And there we 'll have our discussion over Leif Ericson,” said Uncle Tom. “Just now I wish to consider other things with you. Only, permit me to remark, ladies and gentlemen, the singular coincidence that places Leif Ericson's stone house here, on the Charles, within sight of the house of the great poet who wrote 'The Skeleton in Armor.'”
"That's so!" cried Jack. "Perhaps that sad old sea-dog stood right here where we stand to-day, and shouted

'I am a viking bold!
My deeds, though manifold,
No skald in song has told,
    No saga taught thee!
Take heed that in thy verse
Thou dost the tale rehearse,
Else dread a dead man's curse—
    For this I sought thee!'

Look out! Marian; he may be right behind you now," and Jack ended his quotation with so shrill a viking's "skoal!" that Marian jumped aside in terror, and everybody else laughed.

"Let the viking rest, Jack," said Uncle Tom. "True or not, here is the beginning of the story, and, perhaps, though scholars scoff at the idea, the beginnings of the white man in America. Let me get on with my compass. Behind you, rising above its tall green hedge, is Longfellow's house, —a Mecca for Cambridge pilgrims. There he wrote 'The Skeleton in Armor'; there he wrote 'Paul Revere's Ride'; there he wrote 'The Building of the Ship'—that splendid poem that drew tears from President Lincoln in the dreary war-days, and which, with its stirring closing lines, has thrilled countless Americans for over forty years. And in that very house, long before Longfellow was born, George Washington lived, when, here in Cambridge, he took command of the American army."

"Under that big elm, you know," put in Roger, "that you saw in front of Radcliffe College. They say it's over three hundred years old."

"What—the college?" said Jack.

"The college!" echoed Marian, scornfully; "the elm, of course. What a goose you are, Jack Dunlap! Don't you know the girls' college is something new?"

"Oh, is it?" said Jack. "I did n't suppose there was anything new in Cambridge. I thought the flavor of antiquity covered everything here,— Leif Ericson, Washington, Radcliffe, and Harvard's last base-ball victory over Yale."

Uncle Tom paid no attention to Jack's rather flippant remarks, but took up the thread of his broken discourse.

"To your right," he said, "there, beyond the trees of the Common, stood, until a few years ago, next to what is now the fine Law School building, the old-fashioned, roomy, gambrel-roofed house where lived the boy Oliver Wendell Holmes, who afterward wrote 'Old Ironsides' there."

"Nail to the mast that tattered flag,
   Set every threadbare sail,
   And give her to the god of storms,
   The lightning and the gale;"

spouted Jack.

"Only they did n't, you know," said Roger. "The frigate Constitution —'Old Ironsides,' as she was called—was built here in Boston, and is scheduled to drop anchor this year at the Navy Yard, at the mouth of this very Charles River."

"Just think of it," said Christine, "what lots of things of that sort there are around Boston!"

"Why not? It 's the Hub of the Universe—eh, Roger?" Jack said, in what the Boston boy declared to be "the regular New York tone."

"Well, right here is where the American Revolution commenced, so why is n't it the hub?" demanded Bert.

"Why not?" was Uncle Tom's comment. "And in the old Holmes house near the Law School, of which I told you, the Committee of Safety held its meetings when the American Revolution was beginning. There, too, at the opening of the fight, were held the first councils of war, for that home was the headquarters of the first American commander-in-chief, General Artemas Ward."
"What! Artemus Ward, the funny man?" cried Jack. "Was he a general in the Revolution?"

"No, no, Jack; how mixed up you do get!" said Roger. "Why, my father heard Artemus Ward lecture; so he could n't have been a general in the Revolution."

"That's only a make-believe name—what you call a nom de plume," Bert explained. "Your Artemus Ward, Jack, was America's first funny man; his real name was Browne. Uncle Tom's Artemas Ward was America's first major-general—the commander-in-chief before Washington took command. Is n't that so, Uncle Tom?"

"That's about it, Bert," his uncle replied, with his smile of approval.

"It's just another coincidence, the same as Longfellow and the viking's house, I suppose," said Marian. "Go on, Uncle Tom; Jack does break in so."

"Over here to your left, across the tree-tops," Uncle Tom went on, "stands Elmwood, the house in which James Russell Lowell lived, and where he wrote what, I think, is America's noblest poem—his splendid 'Commemoration Ode.'"

"Oh, yes, is n't that fine!" said Christine. "Don't you remember how it ends? I had to learn those lines at school.

'O Beautiful! my Country! ours once more!
Smoothing thy gold of war-disheveled hair
O'er such sweet brows as never other wore,
And letting thy set lips,
Freed from wrath's pale eclipse,
The rosy edges of their smile lay bare,
What words divine of lover or of poet
Could tell our love and make thee know it,
Among the nations bright beyond compare?
What were our lives without thee?
What all our lives to save thee?
We reck not what we gave thee;
We will not dare to doubt thee,
But ask whatever else, and we will dare.''

"Grand, is it not, boys and girls?" Uncle Tom exclaimed, baring his head to that magnificent sentiment of the poet.

"And that 's where Lowell wrote it—over there at Elmwood, is it?" said Jack. "Seems to me there must be something in the Cambridge air that just sets poetry a-sprouting; who knows what might happen if I should come here to Harvard, eh, Roger?"

Jack a poet! The idea was so funny that they all fell to laughing, much to Jack's disgust. When they had sobered down, Uncle Tom went to boxing his compass again.

"The Elmwood house is very much like Longfellow's home, and has, like Longfellow's, a Revolutionary history. It was the mansion of Andrew Oliver, the Tory Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts, and it was mobbed by the angry patriots because Oliver took charge of the hated British stamps that brought about the row. After Oliver left the country the house became the home of Elbridge Gerry, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence."

"Well, well; Cambridge was 'right in it,' from the start, was n't it?" said Jack.

"I told you it was a center of American interests," said Uncle Tom.

"Now, just keep still for a moment, will you, and let me try to give you the steps in American history that we can lay our fingers on, right here in Cambridge-town. There, on the Charles, the Norsemen, so it is said (let us grant, for the sake of historic steps, that they did), built the first house in America. In those college buildings, in Harvard Square, or in the older ones that these have replaced, have gone to school men who built themselves and their memories into the history of the republic. Here met the Provincial Congress, the Committee of Safety, and the council of war in the days that precipitated the American Revolution. Yonder is the old church whose organ-pipes the rebel soldiers melted into bullets for Bunker Hill. Wadsworth House in the College yard, and the Longfellow house, upon which we are looking, were both occupied by Washington when he came here to Cambridge to organize revolution. Along Brattle Street, including the Longfellow house, stood the fine old loyalist mansions that gave the street its nickname of "Tory Row." Under that old elm by Radcliffe, General George Washington took command of the American army, and upon the Common, beyond it, that army was drawn up for review. On that Common, Roger showed you the sturdy young elm grown from a shoot of the old elm and planted there in the centennial year of 1875. Close by the young elm rises the tall monument, topped by a splendid soldier-figure, in memory of the men of Cambridge who rallied to the defense of the flag in the Civil

THE WASHINGTON ELM.
Under this tree Washington took command of the American Army, July 3, 1775. Radcliffe College is on the right in the picture. Cambridge Common, with the growing shoot from the old elm, is at the left.

War. Across the trees, overlooking all Cambridge, rises the imposing tower of Memorial Hall, an honor in stone paid by the great University to all her brave sons who fell in defense of the Union; and, just across the river, stretches the wide meadow upon which the college boys meet in the glorious tussle for mastery in base-ball and foot-ball. It is called Soldiers' Field, a gift to the college, and perpetuating by its name, as does Memorial Hall, the brave boys in blue who marched to defend what Americans in Cambridge, a century before, first strove for and attained. Was I not right when I told you the atmosphere hereabouts was charged with patriotism, that it just throbbed with memories? And, of these memories, two stand out above all others—the two so singularly linked by that old square, yellow house across the way, in which these two men lived and labored for America, though in such different fashion—Washington the soldier, and Longfellow the poet; the man whose sword and the man whose pen have inscribed imperishable names in the history of the republic that so loves and honors them."

"Somehow, Uncle Tom," said Christine, just a bit dreamily, as she leaned against the stone coping of the Longfellow Memorial and looked across the street to what had so long been the poet's home, "I keep thinking of what Longfellow himself wrote after he had stood, one morning, before Lowell's gate at Elmwood. Does n't it fit both the great men who have lived over the way, and the others, too, who have made Cambridge famous? I wonder if I can remember the last lines:

'Sing to him, say to him, here at his gate,
Where the boughs of the stately elms are meeting,
Some one hath lingered to meditate
And send him unseen this friendly greeting;

'That many another hath done the same,
Though not by a sound was the silence broken;
The surest pledge of a deathless name
Is the silent homage of thoughts unspoken.'"

"That's awfully nice, Christine, of course," said Jack, while all the others nodded approval, "only I call it rather rough on Uncle Tom, after he's been spouting away here for half an hour."

Christine colored up at Jack's bit of sarcasm. "You don't understand what I mean, Jack," she said. "But Uncle Tom does," and, with a confident smile, she slipped her hand into that of their "guide, philosopher, and friend," as Bert loved to call his uncle.

As for that young gentleman, he was trying to dovetail history and poetry into a fixed fact. For Longfellow's name and Revolutionary surroundings had recalled to Bert's mind the poet's stirring ballad of a certain famous gallop that had set the fires of liberty ablaze.

"Let's see, Uncle Tom; Paul Revere did n't ride through Cambridge, did he?" Bert inquired.

"No, his route lay through Charlestown and Medford. But Cambridge had its 'fate-of-a-nation' rider in William Dawes. He was Paul Revere's double, and he set out for Concord even before Paul Revere started. Of course," continued Uncle Tom, "you know the story, and why Revere rode with news. The people were restless; they were angry with the King of England for his tyranny, and were ready to protest in something more than words. The King’s men in Boston were watchful and active; they knew the spirit of the people, and hastened to possess themselves of the war-stores the people were gathering at different points about Boston. Their spies were abroad; they knew where the munitions of war were stored; they set out to destroy them. One expedition cleared them out at Salem; another successfully raided the old powder-house at Winter Hill.”

“That old powder-house is still standing, you know,” broke in Roger. “The city of Somerville has made a public park of the hill on which it stands. I want you to see it before you go.”

“We must, Roger,” said Uncle Tom. “It is one of the few really Revolutionary relics left us hereabouts. Well, the Committee of Safety was sitting in Cambridge; a watch was set to keep an eye on the King’s men, and when William Dawes rode through the little college town with word that the regulars were to march to Concord next day to destroy the stores collected there, the minute-men gathered, and from Cambridge and all the near-by towns marched toward Concord to help save the powder and stores upon which their success depended. Some of the men belonging to this section gathered here for their work, and, as they straggled past the Holmes house, where, years after, the poet was born, the Cambridge minister stood in the doorway and bade his neighbors Godspeed on their errand. Next day—the historic nineteenth of April, 1775—came that famous fight.”

“Oh, Uncle Tom, can’t we go to Lexington and see where the battle was fought?” cried Marian, full of enthusiasm to find herself so near the scene of that world-renowned conflict.

“Why not?” said Uncle Tom. “I think it would be an excellent plan for us to ride to Lexington and Concord, to-morrow, and recall the story of the fight on the very spot. What do you say, Roger?”

“I say yes,” Roger replied, catching the spirit of the suggestion. “If you say so, I'll get a wagonette and we'll start from here bright and early."

"A patriotic picnic, eh?" said Jack. "I vote for it with both hands."

The plan was unanimously agreed to. And so it came to pass that, next day, Uncle Tom and his tourists, coming out from Boston after an early breakfast, rode from Cambridge along the very road over which, so many years before, the British red-coats had marched on their hostile errand. For, as Uncle Tom said, there is nothing like getting the lay of the land if you really wish to understand things; and, just then, there was nothing his young people wished more to understand than just how things looked on the village green at Lexington and that famous North Bridge at Concord, where once

"the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world."

Thus it was that the tour of the Revolutionary battle-fields was begun by Uncle Tom Dunlap and his young Americans.
LEXINGTON COMMON.

The old battle monument is in the foreground. To the left the road runs on toward Concord. The real battle-ground is further to the right, and there the later memorials stand.
CHAPTER II

ON LEXINGTON COMMON

THE wagonette, with its freight of battlefield students, left the college quarter of Cambridge on a glorious morning.

“What a day for a ride, and what a ride to take!” was the composite remark of the five happy ones, as, with Uncle Tom in the corner, and a driver who, though Cambridge-born and bred, knew little beyond his horses, they drove by Wadsworth House, and past the old First Church and the ancient mile-stone.

In the shadow of the Washington elm,—which, by the way, a certain learned professor of American history says is no Washington elm—but who will agree with him?—the horses turned to the right and were soon chasing the electrics up the wide thoroughfare of North Avenue to Arlington.

Through that pleasant old town they rode, and were speedily on the Concord turnpike, following the track taken by Dawes, the messenger of danger, and by Smith, with his files of destroying red-coats, on that starlit April night so many years before.

“Do you suppose it was much built up here in the days of the Revolution, Uncle Tom?” Marian inquired.

“Scarcely at all, my dear,” her uncle replied. “The highway from Cambridge to Lexington Common ran then through farmlands, with but an occasional house beside it. One hundred and twenty years in this growing country make quite a difference in the looks of things, you know. When the Revolution broke out, Arlington, which we have just left behind us, was known as Menotomy; this section through which we are now riding was called Cambridge Farms, and Lexington village was a collection of a few houses, grouped about the meeting-house on the green, and with a population, in village and outlying farms, of scarcely more than five hundred. To-day the town has a population of five thousand. This is why it is hard, in this country, for the antiquarian to locate historic events. The march of improvement and the growth of population have been so great that old landmarks have been swept away; roads have been widened and graded, hills leveled, valleys filled, streams obliterated, villages merged into towns, and towns into cities, and the whole face of the land so changed and 'adapted' that one who seeks to point out the exact spot where some famous man was born, or some notable event occurred, has to draw upon his imagination, and give the atmosphere rather than the exact surroundings. Pray bear that in mind, boys and girls, when we are trying to discover or replace the relics of our historic past."

"But can you really call the battle of Lexington a battle, Uncle Tom?" inquired Bert.

"In the strict military sense," Uncle Tom replied, "it was not a battle; it was scarcely even a skirmish. A battle conveys the idea of military manoeuvres, of strategy, charge and countercharge, the shock of squadrons, or the duels of artillerists. There were none of these at Lexington. In the sense that Saratoga and Gettysburg, Waterloo and Sedan were battles, Lexington, of course, is, as Jack would say, 'not in it.'"

"Very kind of you, Uncle Tom," said Jack, with an air of injured innocence, "to charge up all your convenient slang against me. But go ahead; I'm not objecting."

"Lexington," Uncle Tom resumed, with a wave of recognition toward Jack, "was simply an 'affair.' It was an organized resistance to what was considered an unlawful violation of the rights of English subjects—for the colonies were English still; they were not in open nor armed rebellion. Indeed, the records on both sides, after the fight at Lexington, are filled with affidavits made by American and British participants in the affair, alleging that no hostile move was intended, and that no open resistance was made. You see, neither side wished to take the responsibility of saying 'We began the war.' The action of the minute-men was an armed protest rather than a real battle. But its results were unparalleled by any battle of ancient or modern times; for from it sprang the American Revolution, and the American Revolution was the corner-stone of American nationality and of the world's progress in liberty."

"Yes, I know," said Bert; "I have read somewhere that Samuel Adams, when he heard the firing at Lexington, exclaimed: 'This is a glorious morning for America.'"

"Samuel Adams was a prophet, Bert," Uncle Tom replied. "He looked beyond the present; he read the future correctly; he knew the temper of the people and saw that out of that conflict would spring, through all the colonies, the determination to be free. That is why the country through which we are riding and the town we are approaching are as famous as Thermopylae, or Waterloo, or Sedan."
So, with talk and laughter, with eyes open to see the beauty of the rural landscape, and ears attentive to all the details of the day that made the region famous, they rode to Lexington. The highway ran on past stretches of green fields, patches of woodland, trim market-gardens, and suburban estates, with here a modern house, and close beside it a patriarchal relic of colony days.

They drove slowly by every tablet set in fence or wall or house front telling them that here such an event occurred or that there lived such an one who participated in the fight, until, at last, they climbed the slope where, before the temple-like High School building, a mounted cannon, carved in stone, pointed toward the clustering houses of Lexington just beyond.

"What is it—a petrified British battery?" queried Jack.

"Well, you're not so far out of the way, Jack," Uncle Tom replied. "That stone cannon marks the site of the British battery with which Lord Percy hoped to petrify the fighting colonists."

"And did he?" asked Marian.

"Well, hardly," exclaimed Roger, with pardonable pride.

"Go slow, my dear Boston boy," said Uncle Tom. "I am afraid the truth of history scarcely bears out your enthusiasm. If to petrify means to check, the field-piece of Lord Percy, planted where the stone tablet stands and on that hill-top over there, on 'Percy Road' across the way, certainly did check the advance of the pursuing colonists as they drove the tired red-coats through the village we are now entering."

They found Lexington to be, as they rode through its main street, a large and pleasant New England village—"quite citified," Marian declared, as she noted its brick blocks, its spacious and attractive houses, its modern school and church buildings, and its signs of trade and life. There were trees everywhere, whose leafy boughs cast a grateful shade upon the broad street and the triangular plot of green before which the driver reined up his horses and Uncle Tom bade them all alight.

"This, boys and girls," he said, "is one of the most famous bits of turf in all America—the battlefield of Lexington Common!"

Then, standing beside the pulpit-shaped monument of red granite that marks the site of the old meeting-house, Uncle Tom briefly rehearsed the story of the Lexington fight.

"You know how it all came about," he said. "The tea had been thrown overboard at that wharf we saw in Boston. There was trouble brewing. The British were on the hunt for hidden war-supplies. Gage, the English commander at Boston, had sent out soldiers to collect or destroy the powder and stores said to be gathered for war purposes by the colonists. Following out this plan, he had sent troops to Concord, eighteen miles from Boston, where, he had been told, war supplies were stored. They were also to arrest, on their way, those two persistent rebels and ringleaders, John Hancock and Samuel Adams. By some means (it is said through the wife of Gage, a New Jersey woman) the secret leaked out, the signal lanterns were displayed in the North Church of Boston, and Paul Revere and William Dawes rode, by different roads, toward Concord, spreading the alarm.

On that very night of the eighteenth of April, Gage sent Colonel Smith with eight hundred British soldiers on the errand of destruction. Boston had no bridges, so the troops were ferried across the Charles River from what is now the Public Garden or Arlington street to East Cambridge, then called Lechmere Point. They marched across the marshes, and, striking the Concord highway, where now stretches Massachusetts Avenue, passed through North Cambridge, Arlington, and Lexington. Here where we stand, by this pulpit-like monument and that elm-tree back of us (planted by President Grant on the nineteenth of April, 1875), stood the old meetinghouse—a square, boxlike building facing down the street, up which, just as we have come, marched Major Pitcairn and his six companies of light

THE HANCOCK-CLARK HOUSE, LEXINGTON.

"It belonged to relatives of John Hancock, and there he and Adams were sleeping when roused and warned by Paul Revere."
It is within sight from the boulder tablet. It was built in 1695, enlarged in 1734.
infantry and marines sent in advance by Colonel Smith to clear the way, and, if possible, to arrest Hancock and Adams."

"Where were they?" inquired Roger.

"In that house which you can just see on the Bedford road across the railroad track," Uncle Tom replied, pointing out the old Hancock-Clark House. "It belonged to relatives of John Hancock, and there he and Adams were sleeping when roused and warned by Paul Revere. They escaped to the woods, though against Hancock's desires, for he wished to stay and face the British. With them, too, escaped young Dorothy Quincy, who afterwards became Mrs. John Hancock."

"Oh, was n't she the delightful 'Dorothy Q.' of Holmes's poem?" exclaimed Christine. "I remember he says of her portrait:

'Hold up the canvas full in view —
Look! there's a rent the light shines through,
Dark with a century's fringe of dust:
That was a Red-Coat's rapier thrust!'"

"Ah no," replied Uncle Tom, "that charming young lady — she was young, you know, Christine,— 'Grandmother's mother; her age I guess, Thirteen summers, or something less,'— was aunt to the Dorothy Q. who married Hancock. They were captivating young ladies, both of them; but really we must tear ourselves away from them, for here comes Major Pitcairn ready to pop into us.

"Lexington, as you know, had been warned of the coming of the regulars by Paul Revere, and, at two o'clock in the morning, the bell of the church, which hung, not in the church steeple,—for the church had no steeple,—but in an odd kind of belfry built on the ground very near the church, rang out the summons. The Lexington farmers (who were called minute-men, because they were pledged to rally in case of danger 'at a minute's notice') hurried to the meeting-house, but as there were no signs of the British the minute-men were dismissed. At half-past four news came of the advance; the drum beat to arms; out of the Buckman Tavern,—that old house by the elm-tree, just over the way,—and from other houses near by, the minute-men came hurrying to the Common. Their leader was Captain John Parker, a big, brave man. He drew his men in line right here," and Uncle Tom led his tourists to the big granite boulder ten rods to the right of the meeting-house memorial. "He sent such of his men as had no ammunition into the meeting-house where the powder was stored, and then he said —what did he say, Marian? Read what is carved on the boulder, just beneath the musket and powder-horn."

Then Marian read from the carved boulder Captain Parker's words to the minute-men:

"'Stand your ground. Don't fire unless fired upon; but if they mean to have a war, let it begin here.'"

"Here, then, they stood," continued Uncle Tom, "seventy Lexington farmers, against they knew not how many British soldiers, trained in the art of killing. Through the dim light of the early morning came the red-coats. They halted near the meeting-house, and Major Pitcairn rode toward the Americans. 'Disperse, ye villains; ye rebels, disperse!' he commanded. But they would not."

"Well, I guess not," cried Jack, who was growing excited over the story. "That was n't what they were there for."

"Pitcairn flourished his sword before the Americans," Uncle Tom went on, "and, I am sorry to say, swore at them, and added, 'Lay down your arms, I say. Why don't you lay down your arms and disperse?' Still they did not obey, and what he would have done next or just how he would have made them disperse I cannot say. For, as I told you, the British had no wish to begin hostilities, and Pitcairn really did not desire to fire upon the rebels. But just then one of the minute-men,—probably a 'fresh' young fellow, Jack, who was excited, heedless, and 'worked' up,—in disregard of Captain Parker's order, raised his gun and snapped it at the British."
ON LEXINGTON COMMON

THE STONE BOULDER ON LEXINGTON COMMON.

Jonathan Harrington's house is the one on the left. To the front door, seen in the picture, he dragged himself to die at his wife's feet.

"Good for him!" cried Jack.

"What, against orders, Jack?" said Bert.

"I don't care; I would have done it too," Jack declared.

"Yes, I'm afraid you would, Jack," his uncle assented with a significant nod, and then added, "The gun, you know, was one of the old-fashioned flintlock muskets,—perhaps it was n't loaded, perhaps the minute-man snapped it 'just for a bluff,' as you boys say. At any rate the gun did not go off; but the flint struck the steel and the powder flashed in the pan. A British soldier saw the flash; he saw his major turn to give an order of some sort, and, just as much ‘rattled’ as the minute-man, he aimed and fired. A few other British soldiers followed, suit. But no one was injured, and the Americans supposed the guns were loaded with blank cartridges and that the whole affair was just a scare. But the British blood was aroused, and though Pitcairn struck his staff into the ground as an order to desist firing, his soldiers disregarded or did not understand his command. With a loud huzza they fired a general discharge. The musket-balls plowed into the ‘rebel’ ranks. Jonas Parker dropped to his knees; Ebenezer Munroe’s arm fell helpless at his side; now one and now another of that heroic band sank beneath British bullets; up the street came the tramp of the main body of grenadiers, marching to the support of their comrades. Eight hundred against seventy was unequal odds. The minute-men had done what they were assembled to do: they had made their protest; and with a few scattering shots in reply, the minute-men dispersed.\(^1\) The British, wreathed in the smoke of the deadly volley they had just fired, let fly another broadside, gave a cheer of victory, and, wheeling about, marched on to Concord."

The young people drew a deep breath as Uncle Tom concluded, and looked about them.

"And here it happened," said Marian. "My, my, it does n’t seem possible!"

"It is sometimes hard to re-make surroundings," said Uncle Tom. "In this case, although the town has been filled with houses, the roads leveled, and the Common made into a beautiful lawn, we can still look upon some of the very witnesses of that famous fight. Among the relics in the Cary Library, down the street, is the tongue of the very bell that rang out the summons in the meeting-house belfry. On that hill, just beside the fine Hancock school-house, stands that same queer old belfry. Right across from us, on Monument Street, that house marked with a tablet is the Marrett-Munroe house, toward which young Caleb Harrington was running with powder from the church when he was shot down by the British. Into the Buckman Tavern, over the way, the colonists bore their wounded, and, to the left there, on Elm Avenue, at the corner of the Common, that house with the tablet is the one to which Jonathan Harrington, shot down by British bullets, dragged himself, only to die on the doorstep at his wife’s feet. There are, in fact, of the forty houses that made up this village of \(^1\) See frontispiece, reproducing Sandham’s painting of the battle.

Lexington at the time of the battle, eight yet standing which were witnesses of that famous fight. And yonder, on the western edge of the Common, that gray and ivy-draped monument covers the bones of our first martyrs, and is said to be the oldest memorial of the American Revolution in the land. Let us walk around and inspect it.”

They did so, and on the rounded knoll upon which stands the old monument, surrounded by an iron fence and clothed in its coat of “ivy-green,” the visitors studied the quaint old shaft which, with neither grace of construction nor beauty of ornamentation, yet means more to Americans, and even more to the world, than any of the world-famous memorials that tell of historic happenings in the old Europe over the sea.

“This monument was erected in 1799—the year in which Washington died,” Uncle Tom announced. “The bones of the martyrs were removed here from the old burying-ground in 1835 and placed in a stone vault just behind the monument. The inscription here on the front was written by the Rev. Jonas Clark, who was the minister of the old meeting-house on the Common at the time of the battle. It is as inspiring as it is quaint. Can you make it out, Bert?”
Bert settled his glasses firmly on his nose, and, shading his eyes from the sun, slowly read out the inscription on this, the oldest Revolutionary monument in the country:

Sacred to the Liberty and the Rights of Mankind!!!
The Freedom and Independence of America,
Sealed and defended with the Blood of her Sons.

This Monument is erected
By the inhabitants of Lexington Under the patronage and at the Expense of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
To the memory of their Fellow Citizens,
Ensign Robert Munroe, and Messrs. Jonas Parker,
Samuel Hadley, Jonathan Harrington, junr.,
Isaac Muzzey, Caleb Harrington and John Brown, of Lexington, and Asabel Porter of Woburn,
Who fell on the Field, the First Victims to the Sword of British Tyranny and Oppression
On the morning of the ever memorable Nineteenth of April, An. Dom. 1775.
The Die was Cast!!!
The Blood of these Martyrs
In the cause of God and their Country
Was the Cement of the Union of these States, then Colonies, and gave the spring to the Spirit, Firmness and Resolution of their Fellow Citizens.
They rose as one Man to revenge their Brethren's Blood, and at the Point of the Sword, to assert and Defend their native Rights.
They nobly dar'd to be free!!
The contest was long, bloody and affecting,
Righteous Heaven approved the solemn appeal,
Victory crowned their arms, and
The Peace, Liberty, and Independence of the United States of America was their Glorious Reward.

"Whew!" said Jack, as Bert concluded. "But that's a long one, is n't it? I guess old Brother Clark thought folks had lots of time when he made that up."

"Oh, Jack, how can you say so?" Christine protested; and Marian said, "Why, I think it 's just splendid. It reads just as folks talked and wrote a hundred years ago—all capitals and exclamation points and dignity."

"Seems to me Marian 's just struck it, has n't she?" said Roger. "That old monument is a sample of the way people worked and talked when it was built—solid and stilted, and yet, after all, simple and strong. I can't help thinking, though, that we do things better nowadays. While Bert was reading I could n't help comparing this inscription with the short but splendid one on Milmore's grand Sphinx on Chapel Hill in Mount Auburn Cemetery at Cambridge. I want you all to see that before you go away.

And all it says (in English on one side, Latin on the other) is: 'American Liberty Preserved, African Slavery Destroyed, by the Uprising of a great People, by the Blood of Fallen Heroes.'

"That is grand; and it tells the whole story," was Jack's comment.

"Well, but I think this is fine," declared Bert, his eyes still fixed on the old vine- curtained battle monument. "It does n't say too much; it tells the whole story, and it gives the names of those who fell—we should n't remember them in any other way."

"I honor your loyalty to the old shaft, Bert," said Uncle Tom, as he signaled to their driver to bring the wagonette alongside. "It sits particularly well on you, for, did you but know it, eleven of your kinsmen stood in the line of the seventy minute-men yonder where the musket-boulder stands, refusing to disperse, 'not being afraid of the King's commandment'; and to three of the names on this old monument you are related by ties of blood. Not many American boys can make such a claim."

Jack took off his hat as the girls climbed into the wagonette, and made a low bow to his cousin. "After you, sir; after you," he said. "Age before beauty. I'm not sure but so much noble lineage may overweight the British troops fired upon Americans on King street (now State street) in Boston, March 5, 1770, killing five men and wounding six, two of them mortally. The picture is a reproduction of a cut engraved by Paul Revere. The grave of the victims is in the old Granary Burying-ground on Tremont street. Their monument (see page 33) stands on Boston Common.

Carriage and make it one-sided. Don’t you think you’d better ride in front with the driver, my noble son of the Revolution?”

But, for all his fun, Jack was just as proud of Bert’s “heraldry of honor” as any of the party, and made the most of his reflected light when boasting of his cousin’s claim.

As they headed up the Concord road they all gave a last look at the historic green they were leaving behind, and Bert, with his customary desire to get down to facts, said, ‘Then that, Uncle Tom, is really the spot where the Revolution began?’

“Broadly speaking, it certainly is,” Uncle Tom replied. “As to the actual first shot and first act of open resistance, however, there are as many claims as there were colonies. I have always felt that Golden Hill in New York City has as much claim to the credit of ‘first blood’ as the Boston Massacre, where Crispus Attucks and his comrades fell, and which is commemorated by that slate-pencil sort of monument on Boston Common; a certain North Carolina village has the same claim; and, no doubt, some day we shall be talking of putting up a monument to Sukey Carroll."

"Who under the sun was Sukey Carroll?" Marian inquired.

"Why," replied Uncle Tom, "she was the Marblehead girl who sang out to the British soldier who pointed a musket at her, when the King's men were searching Salem for arms: 'Do you think I was born in the woods to be scared by you, you lobster-back?' Which was spirited, if not polite."

"Was that what they called the British soldiers,—lobster-backs?" laughed Jack. "Did n't that fit their red coats well, though? Good for Sukey!"

"But after all," said Uncle Tom, "right here in Massachusetts the American Revolution began. For when James Otis — that 'flame of fire,' as some one has called him — gave up his office of Advocate-General and, in February, 1761, in that room that we saw in the old State House in Boston, argued the case of the people against the King, 'then and there,' as John Adams declared, 'American Independence was born.'"

"Oh, yes, I remember about Otis," said Jack. "He's the patriot that was sandbagged by Tories, was n't he?"

"Yes, and was killed by sunstroke the very year the Revolution succeeded," said Marian.

"I must show you his statue. It is in the chapel at Mount Auburn, you know," Roger reminded them.

"That's the man," said Uncle Tom. "Well, from him and such forerunners of revolution as he, came the historic conflict itself, begun under the elms of Lexington Common where we, to-day, have been re-reading the story."

"But I thought you said both sides denied their intent to fight," said Jack, "and that our forefathers took their 'Alfred Davids,' as that chap in 'Our Mutual Friend' called them, that the other side began it."

"That is so, in fact," replied Uncle Tom. "Neither side had any desire for a conflict. The colonists had no thought but to obtain their rights, and were never more loud in loyalty to King George than after Lexington. Indeed, Mr. Dana argues that not until the Declaration of Independence was America in revolution. He insists that King George and his parliament were, in fact, the revolutionists."

"Well! that's a new idea!" exclaimed Jack.

"But why?" queried Bert.

"They were going contrary to law, he claims," explained Uncle Tom, "while the colonists were standing in defense of the law. But, for all that, Lexington did open the ball, and the minute-men from these very farmlands through which we are now riding gave to the world a lesson in resistance to tyranny that has stood from that day to this as a beacon-light of freedom. I wonder if I can recall Holmes's poem on Lexington. It is peculiarly apt just here, on the field it immortalizes and in the neighborhood of the site of the Cambridge house in which it was written.”

“Let's have it,” urged the boys. Marian said, “Do repeat it;” while Christine, with the glance that compels, silently echoed Marian's request.

So Uncle Tom put on his thinking-cap, and, with but few slips and stumbles, repeated three or four of Holmes's stirring stanzas:

"Slowly the mist o'er the meadow was creeping,
Bright on the dewy buds glistened the sun,
When from his couch, while his children were sleeping,
Rose the bold rebel and shouldered his gun.
Waving her golden veil
Over the silent dale,
Blithe looked the morning on cottage and spire;
Hushed was his parting sigh,
While from his noble eye
Flashed the last sparkle of liberty's fire.

"On the smooth green where the fresh leaf is springing Calmly the first-born of glory have met;
Hark! the death-volley around them is ringing!
Look! with their life-blood the young grass is wet!
Faint is the feeble breath,
Murmuring low in death.
'Tell to our sons how their fathers have died;'
Nerveless the iron hand,
Raised for its native land,
Lies by the weapon that gleams at its side.

"Over the hillsides the wild knell is tolling,
From their far hamlets the yeomanry come;
As through the storm-clouds the thunder-burst rolling,
Circles the beat of the mustering drum.
Fast on the soldier's path
Darken the waves of wrath
Long have they gathered and loud shall they fall;
Red glares the musket's flash,
Sharp rings the rifle's crash
Blazing and clanging from thicket and wall.

"Green be the graves where her martyrs are lying!
Shroudless and tombless they sunk to their rest,
While o'er their ashes the starry fold flying,
Wraps the proud eagle they roused from his nest.
MEMORIAL OF THE BOSTON MASSACRE.
Monument by Kraus, on Boston Common just to the right of the subway on West street.

Borne on her Northern pine,
Long o'er the foaming brine,
Spread her broad banner to storm and to sun;
Heaven keep her ever free,
Wide as o'er land and sea
Floats the fair emblem her heroes have won!

"That 's fine, is n't it?" said Roger.
"Sounds like Scott's 'Hail to the Chief' song," declared Bert.
“Got a dash and go to it that make you just tingle, has n’t it?” said Jack.

“And beautiful, too—that about the martyrs,” said Christine.

“I think so, my dear,” said Uncle Tom; “and it is pleasant to know that our second leader and greatest martyr considered it Holmes’s finest poem.”

“Meaning Lincoln?” queried Bert.

“Yes,” Uncle Tom replied. “Noah Brooks, who was one of his secretaries, tells us that Lincoln could not read it through without a tremble in his voice when he came to the line

‘Green be the graves where her martyrs are lying.’

Perhaps he felt in those verses a prophecy of his own end—a death that was to carry him on in history as our greatest martyr in all the long years that followed Lexington.”

Thus talking and commenting, amid fields and farms and woodlands, and bright stretches of hill and vale, the boys and girls rode on to Concord, where the second chapter in that famous story of our first Nineteenth of April was written in smoke and blood so many years ago.
CHAPTER III

AMONG THE EMBATTLED FARMERS

How They Came to Concord—Dr. Prescott’s Ride—Where the Congress Met—At Concord Fight—The Old Monument—The Statue of the Minute-man—The Story of the Retreat—Dr. Hale’s Poem—Sites and Scenes in a Famous Old Town.

HERE the Lexington highway joins the old Bedford road and both are merged into Lexington Street in Concord town, Marian, with an eye for everything, spied an old house, a stone wall, and an inscription.

“Oh, Uncle Tom!” she cried, pointing; “there’s a tablet in that stone wall. Let’s stop and read it.”

For reply, Uncle Tom bade the driver touch up his horses.

“I’m your young Lochinvar, just now, Marian,” he declared. “You know how it was with him—

‘He staid not for brake and he stopped not for stone.’

Neither for carriage-brake nor tablet-stone have we any use just now. I propose to tell you nothing out of chronological order.”

“Then I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman,” said Jack, leaning out of the carriage to look back. “What’s the matter with the stone?”

“It marks the line of retreat, Jack, and not of advance,” Uncle Tom replied. “I propose that, instead of a wagonette-load of volatile young end-of-the-century Americans, we become one colonial patriot on a fleet horse—Dr. Samuel Prescott, galloping post-haste from Lexington bearing the news of the night-march of the British.”

“Who was Dr. Prescott?” asked Roger.

“A Concord man,” replied Uncle Tom, “kin to a certain Colonel Prescott, of whom you will hear later. Well, we—Dr. Samuel Prescott, you know — have had a hard gallop. But our horse is a fast one, and, by cutting across lots, jumping fences, walls, and ditches, we have narrowly escaped the British scouts, and are now riding into this quaint peace-named town of Concord which nestles at the foot of its sand-ridge and along the banks of its pretty river. And remember we are galloping along a street which to-day is one of the most famous in America.”

“No; no battle was fought just on this piece of road,” Uncle Tom replied. “But because, as we ride, we are passing the homes of a most remarkable group of American writers and thinkers — Hawthorne, Emerson, Thoreau, and the Alcotts.”

“Oh! did Miss Alcott live here — on this street?” came the quick inquiry from every admirer of the famous “Little Women.”

“Why, certainly, she—but there! I am breaking my own rule,” Uncle Tom declared. “We were not to be led aside from our historical sequence. Presto! vanish all modern things. Disappear, Jo, Amy, Meg, and Beth! We are Dr. Prescott, the colonial newsbearer, riding on matters of life and death.”

So, beneath the elms that border Lexington street, they rode into Concord town. Uncle Tom resisted all queries and cajolements designed to lead him from his main purpose, and at last they drew up in front of a large white church, set well back from the street and topped by a gilded dome.

“Who went to church here?” asked Jack, “Washington or the Little Women?”

“Read the tablet, Bert, while Dr. Samuel Prescott gets his breath,” Uncle Tom suggested. “Here we are at the beginning of things.”

Bert adjusted his glasses and read the tablet that stands on the curb in front of the broad church lawn. The others helped, by reading with him in a sort of undertone chorus.
CONCORD, FROM LEE'S HILL.
Lee was a Tory, and his house at the foot of this hill was used as a target by the minute-men.

FIRST PROVINCIAL CONGRESS OF DELEGATES FROM THE TOWNS OF MASSACHUSETTS WAS CALLED BY CONVENTIONS OF
THE PEOPLE TO MEET AT CONCORD ON THE ELEVENTH DAY OF OCTOBER, 1774.
THE DELEGATES ASSEMBLED HERE
IN THE MEETING HOUSE ON THAT DAY, AND ORGANIZED
WITH JOHN HANCOCK AS PRESIDENT AND BENJAMIN LINCOLN AS SECRETARY.
CALLED TOGETHER TO MAINTAIN THE RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE,
THIS CONGRESS
ASSUMED THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PROVINCE
AND BY ITS MEASURES PREPARED THE WAY FOR THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

"Here, you see," said Uncle Tom, as the reading of the tablet ended, "is where the real trouble began. This provincial congress appointed a committee of safety, advised the people to pay their taxes not to the King's officer but to the appointed colonial treasurer, and directed the towns to double their stock of ammunition and store it up for the use of the colony in case of armed resistance to the demands of King George of England."

"But had they the right to do that," queried Bert.
"Why not?" demanded Roger. "It was their ammunition. Had n't they paid for the stuff?"

"But they were colonists," persisted Bert. "They were subjects of King George, and had no right to gather supplies to make war on him."

"No right!" exclaimed Jack. "Well! I guess yes. They took the right, anyhow."

"It was a question of liberty of action and of self-defense," said Uncle Tom. "Whether or not, they really had the right as subjects of the King, at any rate, as Jack says, they took it. That is why General Gage, the British governor, sent out expeditions to hunt up, confiscate, or destroy these colonial war-stores, and why, as you know, the grenadiers and marines were marching from Boston to Concord, where supplies were said to be stored.

"But come! While we have been arguing as to rights, here stands Dr. Prescott with tidings of approaching trouble."

"I'll bet he has n't been standing idle," said Jack. "The whole town knows his news by this time."

"True enough, they do," Uncle Tom assented. "Already lights are flashing out and bells are set a-ringing; the townsmen are aroused; messengers are sent Lexington-way, post-haste, for further tidings; the minute-men are summoned for duty. Soon after daybreak the messengers come galloping back, along the very road that we have traveled, with tidings of the sunrise skirmish on Lexington Common and the news that eight hundred red-coats are well on their way to Concord.

"By this time, the minute-men of Acton and of Lincoln, Concord's next-door neighbors, have reported for action, here, in the square. There is a hurried consultation. Emerson, the minister, who lives in the old manse on the next street, is outspoken. 'Let us stand our ground,' he says. 'If we die, let us die here.' Others, however, hesitate, remembering that open resistance means treason to the King. 'It will not do for us to begin the war,' they say. So, wishing to do everything properly, they decide to take post up on that hill, just back of us, and await developments. More minute-men join them there. Up comes Colonel Barrett from his home, on that hill yonder across the river, where he has
Among the Embattled Farmers

The Road to the Battle-ground.

"Looking down a vista of tall and murmuring pines, they saw a sight they never forgot." This avenue runs from Monument street to the Minute-man and then stops.

been hiding supplies and burying powder and shot. Silent but determined they stand and wait, but only for a brief time; for at seven o'clock there is a gleam of color on the Lexington road, and here, into the square where we are standing, come the eight hundred British soldiers on the double quick."

"Hey, now there's going to be trouble," cried Jack, deeply interested.

"No, not yet, Jack," said Uncle Tom. "Colonel Barrett saw that he was outnumbered. He withdrew from this hill, and marched down to the river where a country road crossed the bridge and stretched away between the farms. Then he took position on the hill slope beyond the bridge, hoping for more help, and waiting the moment to act.

"But the British at once proceeded to business. Their first move was to take possession of the two bridges that spanned the river,—the north and the south,—and prevent the farmers from interfering with them. So, while Smith and Pitcairn with part of the troops held the center of the town and proceeded to smash things, six companies of light infantry marched on and, turning yonder to the right, into what is now Monument street, just beyond the town hall, they pushed on to the North Bridge. My fellow minute-men, the lobster-backs are too many for us. Let us get to the bridge before them and join our comrades on the hill."

"What!" cried Jack; "retreat? Never!"

"Let's not call it retreating, Jack," said Roger. "We'll say that we're marching rapidly in advance of the enemy."

"That's exactly what we're doing, boys," laughed Uncle Tom, as the wagonette turned to the right, into Monument street. "We've simply got to get there before them."

A ride of perhaps half a mile past very new and very old houses carried them across the railroad track to a sharp turn to the left. A signboard on a tree said "Battle Ground, 1775"; and, looking down a vista of tall and murmuring pines, they saw a sight they never forgot. It was the battlefield of Concord.

THE OLD MONUMENT.

This view is from a point just in front of the Minute-man. The bridge is a copy of the historic old North Bridge over which the fight was waged.

"Formerly," Uncle Tom explained, "the road to Carlisle turned off here instead of going forward as it does to-day. This bit of the old road has been preserved and set apart as a memorial of the battle."
They drew up beside the old monument while Uncle Tom gave them the lay of the land.

"Here, you see, the Carlisle road crossed the river. The minute-men, falling back from the hill, crossed the bridge and took station on that slope just beyond. Here others joined them—minute-men from Bedford and Westford, and Littleton, and Carlisle, and Chelmsford,—about four hundred in all. The British came down this road and halted just above where we stand. Some soldiers were hurried to the South Bridge, some were sent off on a search for war-stores, and about a hundred were left to guard the North Bridge. Meantime the soldiers left in the village were unearthing and destroying a few things. The smoke from their fire led the Americans to suppose that the whole village was to be destroyed. 'Shall we let them burn the town?' they asked each other. 'Let us march into the town for its defense,' they said. Then brave Captain Davis, of Acton, drew his sword. 'I have not a man that is afraid to go. March!' he said, and, together, in double file, the minute-men and militia marched down the slope toward the bridge.

'They struck the Carlisle road; the British, seeing them coming, began to rip up the bridge planking; the Americans broke into a run; the British formed in line of battle here where the old monument stands; the Americans halted and drew up in line at the other end of the bridge, where the statue stands. Let us cross over and join our comrades.'

They left the carriage in the shade of the pines, crossed the bridge, and gathered beneath the impressive statue of the Minute-man.

'Only for an instant did the farmers and red-coats face each other in silence,' Uncle Tom continued. 'Then—bang! went a British musket; bang! bang! went another and yet another. Two minute-men fell wounded. Crack—crack—crack! broke a volley from the British. Captain Davis fell dead across a great stone; another and another are down here where we stand. England has begun the war.

"Major Buttrick, the leader of the minute-men, fairly leaps from the ground in excitement. ‘Fire, fellow-soldiers! For God’s sake, fire!’ he cries, and, his own musket leading the fusillade, the first war-guns of the American Revolution speak out their sharp defiance to the King. Again and again the shots fly across the bridge. Two British soldiers fall dead; seven are wounded. Then the firing ceased. The British turn and run back, down Monument street, toward the town, and the victorious farmers hold the little bridge they have so manfully defended."

"Hooray!" cried Jack, waving his hat in energetic emphasis, as if he were Major Buttrick himself.

"How long did it take?" asked Roger.

"Just two minutes," replied Uncle Tom.

"Short and sweet," was Jack’s comment.

"It wasn’t really much of a fight, was it?" said Bert. "Just a bit of a skirmish."
"It was the act more than the action, Bert," Uncle Tom declared. "It meant resistance; it meant war and not peace—dependence, not submission. The minute-men at Lexington had stood in silent protest; they dispersed when once they had asserted their rights even in the face of death. The minute-men of Concord gave back blow for blow; their guns were the first declaration of independence. A skirmish? Yes, Bert. But a skirmish that was indeed a battle, more eventful in the history of the world, so Bancroft asserts, than were Agincourt and Blenheim. Come, cross the bridge with me and read what it says on that old monument, built on the very site of the British line of battle and dedicated in 1836, in the presence of sixty survivors of that memorable day."

Marian read aloud, with the usual half-tone chorus of accompaniment, the inscription on the eastern face of the weather-stained pedestal:

Here
On the 19th of April, 1775, was made the first forcible resistance to British Aggression.
On the opposite bank stood the American militia
Here stood the invading army, and on this spot the first of the enemy fell in the War of the Revolution, which gave Independence to these United States.
In gratitude to God, and in the love of Freedom,
This monument was erected,
A. D. 1836.
"Now cross again," said Uncle Tom, and at his direction Christine read the verse carved on the granite pedestal which supports French's splendid bronze figure of the brave-eyed young Minute-man—one hand on his plow, the other grasping the ready musket:

"By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world."

"Who wrote that, boys and girls?" asked Uncle Tom, and, as with one voice, the five made answer, "Ralph Waldo Emerson."

"Who lived in a square-white house on Lexington street, half a mile or more from here," Uncle Tom added, with a nod of approval; "and who used to spend a good many of his boyish days in that old house to the left of us, among the trees, where his grandfather lived before him—a famous old house now, known all over the world?"

"Why?" asked Christine, "is it— is it—?"
"Yes, it is," Uncle Tom replied, "the Old Manse, made famous by Hawthorne."

"Oh, let's go right over there and gather some mosses," said Marian.

"You can't," grumbled Jack. "It says, 'Private Grounds. Trespassing strictly prohibited.'"

"How mean!" came the disapproving verdict.

"Yes; there Hawthorne wrote his 'Mosses from an Old Manse'; there Emerson wrote his essay, 'Nature,' and many of his best poems; and there, from that upper window, now nearly covered from sight by its curtain of pines, the grandfather of the man who wrote the famous lines on the monument watched the fight with the greatest anxiety, fearful that his parishioners—who, it is said, locked him in to keep him out of danger—would not return the British fire."

"But they did," said Jack, pointing at the statue.

"What a beautiful statue!" said Marian, looking up at the fine but determined face.

"What a splendid verse!" said Christine, studying the pedestal.

"What a great day!" said Bert, thrilled by all the action of the time.

"Right you are, boys and girls," Uncle Tom assented. "Here, indeed, is a remarkable combination. As some one has said of it, standing here as we do, and looking upon this statue of the Minute-man, 'There are few towns in the world that can furnish a poet, a sculptor, and an occasion.' I think that 's so, don't you?"

They lingered long in that beautiful spot. At their feet flowed the river; above them towered the spirited Minute-man; before them stretched the beautiful avenue of pines that frames the historic field. The rusty gray obelisk that tells the story of the fight; the suggestive slab set in the stone wall to mark the grave of the British soldiers who fell beneath the fire of the defiant farmers; the bit of old road preserved only because of its historic associations; the place, the day, the delightful surroundings—everything held and impressed them, and as they strolled along the avenue of pines to where their carriage waited for them on the highway, Marian declared, enthusiastically, "Splendid! is n't it? It 's worth coming miles to see." And every boy and girl echoed the declaration.

Then they took a last look down the green and piny vista to where, beyond the bridge, that farmer-boy in bronze stands sentinel beside his plow, the guardian spirit of that famous field.

"'Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,'" Bert quoted, musingly. "Is that really true, Uncle Tom? Did the minute-men carry a flag?"

"Why not?" asked Jack. "What good is a battle without a flag?"

"Bert is a born investigator," laughed Uncle Tom. "I 'm afraid it 's a case of poetic license. So far as I can discover, no flag was carried by the minute-men or displayed either at Lexington or Concord. The Nineteenth of April, 1775, was a protest and not a parade. There was no military order among these farmer-folk. It was a case of every man being a fighter on his own hook. It began here at Concord, and ended only when the last harried red-coats found safety under the guns of the English fleet at Charlestown, twenty miles away."

"That was a great retreat, was n't it?" said Roger.

"Sort of a twenty-mile go-as-you-please, I guess," said Jack. "How was the start, Uncle Tom?"

"Handicapped, Jack," replied his uncle, falling in with the boy's athletic simile. "The British officers knew they had roused the country-side, and when they had called in their men and started on the homeward march, they were so certain it would be a running fight that Smith, the commander, did everything he could to ward it off. He put 'flankers' up on that sand-ridge to protect his line from the provincials, who, after the fight at the bridge, struck across country over the 'Great Fields,' as that pasture land to the left is called. But where the ridge stops at the Old Bedford road, the flankers on the hill were no longer of avail, and when the retreating
ON THE ROAD TO CONCORD.

"From all the country round the farmers came hurrying to the relief of their neighbors."
British struck that point where we saw the tablet at the junction of the Bedford and Lexington roads, their terrible troubles began. We 'll drive up there now and see the fight."

"Which way?" asked Roger.

"Well, you see we can't drive across the Great Fields with the minute-men," Uncle Tom replied; "so we 'll have to play that we are the British for a little while. Here we are, in the square. It 's no use, Jack, we 've simply got to retreat with the rest of them until we get to the cross-roads. Then we 'll become minute-men once more. Here is where it went on. For nearly an hour the red-coats were marching and counter-marching, because, you see, Colonel Smith, the British leader, was uncertain what to do. Then came the order 'About face! for Boston.'

"By this time the news had spread. From all the country round the farmers came hurrying to the relief of their neighbors. Too late Smith saw that he would have to run the gantlet for home."

"Began to see the box he was in, didn't he?" said Jack.

"It was a box sure enough," Uncle Tom replied. "The highway stretched through Lexington to Charlestown and the sea. All along, it was flanked by stone walls or ran between hills. Behind these the Americans were posted as if behind breastworks. Here where the sand-ridge is stopped by the old Bedford road, was the first exposed place, and here, as I told you, the trouble began. This is Merriam's Corner. Now, Marian, you can give us the tablet you wished to read as we came riding into town."

Marian stepped from the carriage, and standing before the tablet set in the low stone wall, read it aloud:

THE BRITISH TROOPS
RETREATING FROM THE OLD NORTH BRIDGE
WERE HERE ATTACKED IN FLANK
BY THE MEN OF CONCORD AND NEIGHBORING TOWNS AND DRIVEN UNDER A HOT FIRE TO CHARLESTOWN

"That 's literally true," Uncle Tom remarked. "They were really 'driven' to Charlestown."

"Under a hot fire?" queried Bert.

"Never hotter," replied his uncle. "Here the Medford and Reading minute-men joined their Concord brethren and began the stone-wall fight that lasted for nearly twenty miles. On the Lincoln ridges the Woburn men took a hand and Pitcairn lost his horse; before Lexington was reached.
AMONG THE EMBATTLED FARMERS

Among the embattled farmers the Wright Tavern. Where Major Pitcairn vowed vengeance on the "rebels." This house has suffered less change than any other building in Concord.

the men who had faced the British on the green that morning 'pitched into them.' At Fiske's Hill, just this side of Lexington, a hot fight took place, and the British began to run in disorder. At Lexington village, near where we saw the stone cannon on the hill, the reinforcements sent from Boston under command of Lord Percy were met—twelve hundred men, with two cannon. But when, after a rest, the homeward march was taken again, numbers only increased the opportunity for good shots, and the enraged farmers hung on the skirts of the retreat and harried the red-coats, as hounds do the game, all along the road."

"Poor fellows!" said Christine.

"What do you say poor for?" asked Jack, indignantly. "It served them right. They had no business to be there."

"But they could n't help it, Jack," said Christine. "They were ordered to march to Concord."

"Soldiers have to obey orders, Jack," said Uncle Tom. "and those poor red-coats found the trip uncomfortable enough without your added condemnation. As they lagged along under the hot April sun, foemen sprang out upon them at all points. The British would whirl around and drive away one force, only to be peppered at by another. It seemed, as one British soldier declared, to 'rain rebels.' The tablets all along the road between here and Charlestown record the story of that fearful retreat. It cost King George nearly three hundred men out of a force of eighteen hundred, and the news, spread by swift riding from Maine to Georgia, aroused thirteen colonies to action, and opened a seven years' fight for independence."

"How many Americans were killed?" asked Bert.

"About fifty," Uncle Tom replied. "They knew how to fight, you see. They were hunters and could stalk the game. There is a poem by Edward Everett Hale that you must hunt up and read when you get home. You will find it in his 'Story of Massachusetts,' and it is one of the most striking pictures of that Nineteenth of April man-hunt that I know of. It ends something like this"—and beneath a spreading elm that cast long shadows across the Lexington highway, Uncle Tom reproduced the picture that Dr. Hale drew:

"Well, all would not die. There were men good as new—
From Rumford, from Saugus, from towns far away,—
Who filled up quick and well, for each soldier that fell,
And we drove them and drove them and drove them all day.
We knew, every one, it was war that begun,
When that morning's march was only half done.

"In the hazy twilight, at the coming of night,
I crowded three buckshot and one bullet down.
'T was my last charge of lead, and I aimed her and said,
"Good luck to you, Lobsters, in old Boston Town."

"In a barn at Milk Row, Ephraim Bates and Munroe,
And Baker and Abram and I made a bed;
We had mighty sore feet, and we 'd nothing to eat,
But we 'd driven the Red-coats; and Amos, he said:
AMONG THE EMBATTLED FARMERS

THE JONES HOUSE.
Now generally known as the "Keyes House." It is opposite the battle-ground, and the white spot near a window in the ell, between two doors, marks a bullet-hole. Here too is the stone across which Captain Davis fell dead.

"'It 's the first time,' said he, 'that it 's happened to me
To march to the sea by this road where we 've come;
But confound this whole day but we 'd all of us say
We 'd rather have spent it this way than to home.'"

"The hunt had begun with the dawn of the sun,
And night saw the wolf driven back to his den.
And never since then, in the memory of men,
Has the Old Bay State seen such a hunting again."

"Well! it was a hunting of men, was n't it?" exclaimed Jack as the wagonette turned and drove back to Concord.

"It seems so dreadful, though," said Christine. "Think how many families it broke up."

"War is always dreadful, my dear," Uncle Tom replied. "To-day we see only the heroic side of the American Revolution, but for a generation and more after Concord and Lexington, so old people have told me who were children then, the subject was never talked of at home; it was all so dreadful, they said."

Then, talking over the day and what it meant to America and the world, for all its tragic and sorrowful phases, they came at last to the little hotel where they were to spend the night in Concord.
They were well repaid for thus lengthening their stay. For what a day Uncle Tom gave them on the morrow!

Guided by him they walked about this "town of tablets," as Marian called it, deeply interested in all they saw. The citizens of the quaint old town have put up memorial stones to mark almost everything of note that ever occurred there, while the historic houses, the literary shrines, and the beautiful surroundings of Concord made a lasting impression on these receptive young minds.

They visited the houses of historic interest; they saw the British bullet-mark in the ell of the rambling old Jones house; they touched the very stone across which brave Captain Davis fell dead; they stood within the identical Wright Tavern, in which Pitcairn, fuming at the "obstinacy" of the "rebels," stirred his toddy with a bloody finger and vowed vengeance; they lingered before the tall gate-posts at the entrance of the Old Manse made famous by Hawthorne; they worshiped in clamorous admiration before the house which had been the home of Hawthorne and, later, the scene of the early exploits of the "Little Women." They saw the house in which that charming story had been written; they looked upon the home of Emerson, and followed the footsteps of Thoreau; they canoed up and down the beautiful Concord River; they rode to Fairyland and to Walden Pond and added, each, a stone to the memorial pile on the spot where once had stood Thoreau's hermit hut; they visited the library and the antiquarian rooms, filled with memorials of famous folks from the days of the Puritans to those of John Brown.

And, last of all, they stood on that remarkable knoll in beautiful Sleepy Hollow Cemetery and looked upon that little cluster of graves, almost within touch of each other, where lie the remains of Emerson and Hawthorne and Thoreau and the two Alcotts,—father and daughter,—as grand a group of worthies as can be found thus brought together anywhere outside of Westminster Abbey.

Then they rode back, along the historic highway, following the British retreat quite to Charlestown neck, through Lexington and Arlington and Somerville—a road fairly peppered, as Jack declared, with memorial tablets and historic houses, eloquent reminders of that ever famous Nineteenth of April, 1775.

At Sullivan Square they dismissed their carriage and took the electrics into Boston—saturated, so Bert affirmed, with facts and sights of one of the most famous episodes in the world's story of liberty, and of that eventful day that gave birth to American freedom.
View of The Attack on Bunker's Hill, with the Burning of Charles Town, June 17, 1775.
CHAPTER IV

ON BUNKER HILL

Climbing the Monument—The View from the Top—Tracing the Battle-ground—The Redoubt—Colonel Prescott—Warren and Putnam—The Story of the Assault—Victory or Defeat?—Webster’s Oration—The Tablet on Dorchester Heights—The First American Victory.

"How many?" panted Marian, poised on the topmost step; "I lost count."

"Two hundred and ninety-two, two hundred and ninety-three, two hundred and ninety-four!" counted Bert, a good second in the race.

"Dear me! are we at the top at last?" said Christine. "Where’s Uncle Tom?"

"Coming, coming, my dear," a voice replied from the depths. "This tells on flesh, and thirty-six does n’t spring up two hundred and twenty-one feet as easily as nimble fifteen."

"Are we really two hundred and twenty-one feet from the ground?" said Marian. "My, what a view!"

They stood at last, together, within the little circular chamber, pierced with four barred windows—the top of Bunker Hill Monument.

The day was clear and bright. Sea and shore alike stood free of haze or mist, and far to the west, beyond the ridge of Monadnock, they traced the filmy outline of Kearsarge, the high New Hampshire mountain, a good ninety miles away.

Uncle Tom had put all other plans aside.

"It is an ideal day for the monument," he said.

And indeed it was.

"Two hundred and twenty-one feet seems short, alongside of the Washington Monument’s five hundred," said Jack. "And yet it seems as high."
"That's because there's no elevator here," said Marian, still breathing hard from her race up the last turn.

"There was an elevator here once, many years ago," Uncle Tom informed them. "But it was a crude, cramped, unsafe affair, and after it had fallen once, and nearly killed its passengers, it was given up, and now visitors have to trust to 'Shanks's mare.'"

Christine and Roger were already at the east window, drinking in the superb ocean view. Bert was studying out the inscription on the bursted memorial cannon hung up on the wall, while Jack was wondering how under the sun they could have rigged an elevator to slide up and down that narrow central cavity.

Uncle Tom called them about him and slowly made the circuit from window to window.

"No other place in all the world," so he told them, "unless it be the Acropolis at Athens, so clearly discloses the real panorama of a battle region. It is almost as if we were taking a bird's-eye view from a balloon. See! to the east is the sea!"

"Is n't it glorious!" cried Marian, a great lover of salt water.

"Over that stretch of blue, and here into Boston Harbor, came the British fleet to discharge its cargo of red-coats for the subjugation of America."

"Only they did n't subjugate," put in Jack.

"In this narrower stretch of the Charles River, just below us, six British men-of-war were moored with guns trained on these rebel heights. South of us is Boston-town, without bridges then, and small indeed compared with its bulk to-day; but it was the very hotbed of rebellion; working toward the west we see Dorchester and Cambridge, Arlington, Somerville, and Medford, until we get around here to the Mystic, flowing down to join the Charles. To the North, across the Mystic, lie Malden and Everett, Chelsea, Reveré, and Lynn. And that rocky cape-like piece running into the sea is famous Nahant, where Longfellow and Agassiz and Sumner and other great Bostonians made their summer home. Across that long ridge—here out of the west window—lie Lexington and Concord. So, you see, we are indeed at the very center of revolutionary beginnings."

"Is n't it down there that Paul Revere stood waiting for the signal?" asked Christine, pointing to the river's edge.

"Yes, we can see him if we look out here through the south window," said Uncle Tom. "See, that little clump of trees just across the river is Copp's Hill burying-ground—the site of a British battery, and the tall spire beside it is the old North Church where the signal lanterns were hung. There! they are flashing out the news, and at once, galloping past us up Main street, just at the Charlestown and So-and Arlington, Revere tidings of the British the west window, you turns past East Camcalled Lechmere's Point. der under Smith and Pit-march to Lexington.
Further up the river, where the Roxbury road ran across the foot of this hill, through merville and Medford spurs on, spreading the march. Here, through can see where the Charles bridge—then it was There the 800 British cairn gathered for their narrow neck of land, marched Lord Percy and his 1200 reinforcements.
And through this western window you can almost trace the line of retreat which we followed the other day, along which, from Concord to Charletown, raced the British rout."

"Where 's Sudbury, Uncle Tom?" Christine asked. "Don't you know that 's where the landlord lived, in the Wayside Inn?"
‘And over there, no longer bright,
Though glimmering with a latent light,
Was hung the sword his grandsire bore
In the rebellious days of yore
Down there at Concord, in the fight.’

“Sudbury is over Concord way, across those hills, through the west window,” Uncle Tom replied. “The Wayside Inn is standing yet and in fine condition; we'll try to get over there some day and visit it. Don't you remember what the poet said about the landlord's grandfather as he looked on the sword?

‘Your ancestor who bore this sword
As Colonel of the Volunteers,
Mounted upon his old gray mare,
Seen here and there and everywhere,
To me a grander shape appears
Than old Sir William, or what not,
Clanking about in foreign lands,
With iron gauntlets on his hands
And on his head an iron pot.’

That's my case exactly. I see more real heroism in these Minute-men and Militia Volunteers of Lexington, and Concord, and Bunker Hill, and get more real inspiration from them than from all the Battles of the Spears and of the Standards and what not, in the days that Cervantes, in ‘Don Quixote’, laughed to death.”

“Lexington, you say, was an ‘affair’; Concord was a ‘skirmish’; was Bunker Hill really a battle?” asked Roger.
“Let’s go down-stairs and see,” Uncle Tom replied. “We’ll fight it over again on its own ground.”

With a final look at the wonderful panorama of land and sea, caught through the four windows of that tall gray shaft, the party clattered down the two hundred and ninety-four stone steps and stood at last upon all that is left of the little elevation first known as Russell’s Pasture (when it was the scene of war), afterwards as Breed’s Hill and now forever famous under its mistaken name of Bunker Hill.

Uncle Tom briefly reminded them of the causes that led to the fortification of this height by the Americans; how the farmers of New England had surrounded Boston-town, after Lexington and Concord had stirred them to action, with a cordon of rude little forts and earthworks extending in a wide semicircle from Dorchester Heights to Chelsea; how they had thus shut up the British in Boston,—sixteen thousand Yankee farmers holding ten thousand disciplined British troops at bay; how the Committee of Safety sitting at Cambridge decided that a good fort on Bunker Hill would keep the British ships from sailing up the Charles or the Mystic; how they sent twelve hundred men to fortify it, and how, after looking over the ground, the soldiers decided to first throw up a redoubt on the lower height, nearer the river. He told them how the soldiers worked all night unnoticed by the British, who, when they awoke on the morning of the seventeenth of June, and saw what the “rebels” had been at, proceeded to attempt to dislodge them.

“Bunker Hill Monument,” said Uncle Tom, “stands just about in the center of the little fort, or redoubt, as it is called, which inclosed in an irregular rectangle something over seventeen thousand square feet of land.”

“About how much is that, Uncle Tom?” Marian asked, with a rather hazy idea of figures.

“How much land is there in your house lot at home?” asked Uncle Tom.

Marian looked at Jack.

“It’s twenty-five by one hundred,” he replied, answering her query.

“Then the fort on Bunker Hill occupied about as much land as seven New York City house lots,” said Uncle Tom. “The ramparts were about six feet high, with a narrow ditch at their base. See! here is a stone tablet marking the southeast corner of the redoubt; here”—and he led them along the asphalt walk an hundred feet or so—“is the stone that marks the northeast corner. Then it stretched back there toward Concord street, and at the south end over a defended entrance or sally-port. Here, to the north, as this tablet tells you, ran an outer or protecting breastwork three STATUE OF COLONEL WILLIAM PRESCOTT.

He commanded the redoubt on Bunker Hill. The statue stands just in front of Bunker Hill Monument.

hundred feet, until it ended in a muddy bog where no one could wade. Across from this corner, as this tablet tells you "— and Uncle Tom led them along the path to the northern corner —" was to run another protecting breastwork to guard the rear. There was no time to build one, so Knowlton, of Connecticut, extended a rail-fence to the river, put up another parallel to it, and filled in between with new-mown hay to within about six hundred feet of this point. A similar fence ran out on the opposite side. It took a thousand men all night to finish this well-planned fortification. At sunrise it was scarcely done. But the British then discovered it and prepared to assault it."

"Who commanded the Americans?" inquired Bert.

For answer, Uncle Tom led them to the southern front of the monument where stands the bronze statue of Colonel William Prescott—a strong and spirited figure.

"That was the hero of Bunker Hill," he said, "the fearless commander within the redoubt—related by blood to that Dr. Samuel Prescott who, you remember, rode post-haste to Concord."

"I thought Warren was the leader," said Bert.

"That was his statue inside the monument office, was n't it?"

"Yes," Uncle Tom replied; "but Warren was only a volunteer, acting under orders at the battle, even though he was president of the provincial congress and a major-general."
“But he was a hero,” insisted Bert.

“Most assuredly,” his uncle replied. “When Elbridge Gerry, at Cambridge, begged him not to go into the fight, he replied quietly, ‘Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori’: which means—what, Bert?”

“It is sweet and becoming to die for one’s country,” replied the student Bert.

“Yes,” replied Uncle Tom; “and when he reached Bunker Hill he asked General Putnam, who directed there, to put him where he could be most useful. Putnam suggested this fort here on Russell’s Pasture, and Warren, although appointed a major-general that day by Congress, refused to take the command offered him from Colonel Prescott, but said: ‘I come as a volunteer with my musket to serve under you.’ A very brave, courteous and lovable man was Doctor and General Joseph Warren.”

“Putnam was brave too, was n’t he?” asked Roger.

“As brave and impetuous as when he faced the wolf in its den,” Uncle Tom answered. “Bunker Hill—the height beyond this, you know—was his strong point. He held, and rightly, that the fortification on this slope was of no benefit unless protected by a redoubt on Bunker Hill. He began, in fact, to throw up earthworks there, but he had not men enough nor time enough to complete them. For, before he could fairly get to work, the battle was joined. You know the story of the fight, of course.”

“Yes; but tell it to us, Uncle Tom,” said Marian.

“That ’s so, right here where it was really fought,” Jack chimed in.

“A few words should tell it,” said Uncle Tom. “The British landed over there, where you see the Navy Yard buildings. The sun shone brightly; the day was hot; Prescott, a magnificent figure, walked calmly among his men, cautioned them to go slow and reserve their fire until the word came. At the rail fence Putnam held command. He, too, encouraged his men, told them that every shot must count, and ordered them not to fire until they could see the whites of their enemies’ eyes.”

“George! that was pretty close range, was n’t it?” said Jack.

“How horrible!” sighed Christine.

“It had to be, my dear. War is no child’s-play. It is horrible,” said Uncle Tom. “The British soldiers, marching as if on parade, came solidly against the American entrenchments. The right wing, led by General Howe, headed for the rail fence; the left wing, commanded by General Pigott, advanced toward the redoubt. The Americans, standing on the little platform that brought their guns to the level of the rampart, waited quietly. The British fired as they marched; but they aimed too high. The Americans covered each his man. Then, when their foemen were dangerously near, came the word of command: Fire! The muskets held by farmers and marksmen spoke with deadly effect. At the rail fence Howe’s red-coats staggered, recovered and then broke — repulsed. Before the redoubt, here on the hill, the British fell under the murderous fire; their line broke, swayed, turned and retreated down the hill. Again the red ranks reform; again they march against rail fence and redoubt, only again to be met by that murderous fire, and to stagger down the slope, where now their dead and wounded lie strewn in confusion. The farmers of New England have stood like their own granite against the veteran troops of England.”

“Then it was a victory, Uncle Tom,” cried Jack. “I always said it was. I've played it lots of times on snow forts, boys. It's great sport. You can just send the British kiting back every time. I always said it was a victory for us."

"Wait, wait, Jack; the end is not yet," Uncle Tom replied. "It was a victory thus far. But now Prescott's men look troubled even in the midst of their hurrahs. Their ammunition has given out. Only a few artillery cartridges for the almost useless cannon are on hand. Prescott has them torn open and the powder distributed, almost grain by grain, among the musket-men. 'Don't waste a kernel,' he says; 'make every shot tell.'"

"And they did, I'll bet," said Jack.

"They did, but to little avail," his uncle replied. "Howe was angered at his double repulse and put all his efforts into carrying the redoubt by storm. His red-coats surged up the hill; once more came the farmers' deadly fire, but not with the strength or volume of the earlier broadsides. There came no second discharge. The British swarmed over the breastwork; clubbed muskets, bare bayonets, paving-stones confronted them. It was a bloody hand-to-hand conflict. Then, the Americans turned and retreated toward Bunker Hill, where Putnam, who had withdrawn his men from the rail fence, hoped to rally them. Over there, in the middle of Concord street, Warren fell—the American Revolution's first notable victim. The British artillery swung around in flank, opened a galling fire on the fugitives, and the retreat, turning into a rout, surged down the hillsides and over toward the camp at Cambridge. Had reinforcements or ammunition been forthcoming, the day might have been crowned with success.”

"Then it was a defeat," sighed Bert.

"Really it was, because the British gained and held the hill," Uncle Tom replied. "But in moral effect, in its influence on the Americans who now saw that they could stand their ground against British troops, and equally in its influence on the English commanders, who never after attempted to carry by storm an American earthwork, Bunker Hill was a victory, and is so held and celebrated by us. Gage lost eleven hundred out of twenty-five hundred men, and lost besides his power and command; for when the news of the battle reached England, the man who was so palpably outgeneralled by 'a parcel of Yankee farmers' was recalled, and his command given into other hands."

"How many Americans were killed, Uncle Tom,?" asked Roger.

"One hundred and forty," Uncle Tom replied. "Their names all appear on those great bronze tablets yonder in Winthrop Park, where we will go after we leave the hill."

They went there shortly, but first they made one more circle of the historic hill, following the lines of the redoubt. They stood on the spot where the brave Warren fell, in front of what is now No. 32 Concord street. They inspected all the pictures and relics in the little monument museum—the statue of Warren—the timber from the wreck of the Somerset, the British man-of-war whose marines set the town of Charlestown on fire—General Putnam's sword—Major Worthen's gun and cartridge-box, and the memorials of Daniel Webster, whose splendid orations at the beginning and the completion of the monument on Bunker Hill are now a part of the literature of America.

Then, with a last look at Prescott's martial figure guarding the base of the tall gray shaft, they went down from the hill, and, at the entrance to Winthrop Park, read with deepest interest the names of the officers and men who fell in this famous Battle of Bunker Hill.
As he read the line from Daniel Webster that stands at the bottom of one of the tall tablets ("The blood of our fathers—let it not have been shed in vain"), Jack backed away toward the soldiers' monument, and looking up the vista between the twin tablets where the tall shaft topped the green hill, he pointed at the monument, and broke out into those splendid words of Webster that so many school-boys have learned and spoken:

"The powerful speaker stands motionless before us. It is a plain shaft. It bears no inscriptions, fronting to the rising sun, from which the future antiquarians shall wipe the dust. Nor does the rising sun cause tones of music to issue from its summit. But at the rising of the sun and in the setting of the sun, in the blaze of noonday and beneath the milder effulgence of lunar light, it looks, it speaks, it acts to the full comprehension of every American mind and the awakening of glowing enthusiasm in every American heart. Its silent, but awful utterance; its deep pathos, as it brings to our contemplation the seventeenth of June, 1775, and the consequences which have resulted to us, to our country, and to the world from the events of that day, and which we know must rain influence on mankind to the end of time; the elevation with which it raises us high above the ordinary feeling of life surpass all that the study of the closet or even the inspiration of genius can produce."

"Fine, fine indeed," cried Uncle Tom, appreciatively, while the others "gave the palm" to Jack's oratorical powers. "Now let us have the completion of that same Webster oration, Jack, and then I think we can leave the Bunker Hill Monument duly impressed and benefited. Begin with the last paragraph, you know."

And Jack, nothing loth,—he did dearly love to "spout" on occasion,—gave the desired peroration:

"And when we and our children shall all have been consigned to the house appointed for all living, may love of country and pride of country glow with equal fervor among those to whom our names and blood shall have descended. And then, when honored and decrepit age shall lean against the base of this monument, and troops of ingenuous youth shall be gathered round it, and when the one shall speak to the other of its objects, the purposes of its construction, and the great and glorious events with which it is connected—there shall rise from every youthful breast the ejaculation—'Thank God!—I also—am an American!'"

Then they left the monument and the tablets and rode into Boston. That afternoon they boarded a City Point "electric" at Post-office Square and swinging about past the rising walls of the great Southern Depot and amid the railroad and shipping centers of the south side, they crossed the Federal street bridge and whizzed through Broadway, the wide main street of South Boston. As they rode along, Uncle Tom, who had informed his young people that he was now about to take them to the closing scene in the Revolutionary siege of Boston, told them that Bunker Hill was really one of America's turning-points.

"The battle settled things in one way especially," he said. "It proved to the world that America meant war, and that there was possible no peaceable solution of the problem which England's obstinacy had raised. Though a defeat, it had given the colonies courage and backbone. As Webster said of it, the fearful crisis was past. The appeal now lay to the sword; and the only question was whether the spirit and resources of the people would hold out till the object was accomplished. Washington, as he rode northward from Philadelphia on his way to the old elm at Cambridge, met a messenger carrying to Congress the news of Bunker Hill. To his inquiries the messenger answered that the provincials retreated only because of lack of ammunition. 'Did they stand the fire of the regulars?' Washington asked anxiously. 'That they did,' said the messenger, 'and held their own fire in reserve until the enemy was within eight rods.' Washington appeared relieved. 'Then,' said he to his companions, 'the liberties of the country are safe.' To him, the fearless stand of the New England militia meant material for soldiers—just what he was at that time most anxious about."

"Was he commander-in-chief then?" asked Roger.

"Yes, he was chosen on the fifteenth of June, 1775, just two days before the battle of Bunker Hill," Uncle Tom replied, "and at once he set out for the camp at Cambridge. On the second of July he reached the town and made his headquarters first in Wadsworth house, which I showed you fronting Harvard Square on the college grounds, and shortly after in the big square colonial house on Brattle street, now dear to all the world as the home of Longfellow. On the next day—the third of July—he took command of the army, standing beneath the old elm in whose broken shadow you also stood, against Radcliffe College near to Cambridge Common. All summer and winter he was striving to put his motley army of ten thousand constantly changing men into some sort of military shape.

He drew the line of siege closer and closer about the British in Boston.
But when spring came he knew that he must do something. He prepared to attack the British inside their lines, and, as the first movement, occupied and fortified the high land here in South Boston, then known as Dorchester Heights. Let us go and see the exact spot."

A ride of twenty-five minutes brought them to the corner of H street, where, leaving the car, they passed down Broadway so that Uncle Tom might show them the broad and breezily elevated building made famous by the marvelous life-stories of Laura Bridgman and Helen Keller—the Perkins Institution for the Blind, the first "blind school" in America.

"It is almost on the slopes of Dorchester Heights, you see," Uncle Tom explained, "and is thus doubly a notable landmark. See, we turn here from Broadway into G street. We are now assaulting another slope quite as high and fully as historic as Bunker Hill."

Where G street swept around a circular knoll of green, Uncle Tom crossed the street and led his young people through the open gateway.

"This slope," he said, "is a part of what was formerly known as Dorchester Heights. It is now Thomas Park, so named in memory of John Thomas, one of the best and bravest of our early Revolutionary generals."

"Never heard of him," said Jack, sprinting up the asphalt slope. "Did you, Roger?"

And the Boston boy was forced to confess that the name was new to him.

"Is n't there something about John Thomas in Thackeray?" queried Christine, who was just beginning to enjoy the great English humorist.

"Tut, tut! Christine," Uncle Tom corrected. "You are almost as bad as Jack—"

"Come; I like that!" cried Jack, breaking a stride in half, by way of protest.
"I mean that Artemus Ward query of yours in Cambridge," Uncle Tom explained. "To far too many of this generation Artemas Ward is only, as Jack said, America's funny man, and John Thomas means Thackeray's English flunky. Instead, to Americans, those names should stand for the two leading generals in the early American army, before George Washington took command here at Boston. To General John Thomas was due the wonderfully rapid and effective fortifying, by Washington's order, of this rise of land called Dorchester Heights. There were several heights hereabouts then, you know, and they commanded the beleaguered city, as you can readily see."

They did see this at once, as they stood on the crest of the hill, beside the fence that separates the old reservoir basin from the green park. Before them stretched the chain of treeless islands that dot the broad, blue harbor; beyond them lay the town, within easy cannon-range, and Bert declared that he really could n't see what under the sun the British were thinking of, to allow the Americans to get in ahead of them.

"Why did n't they seize and occupy this height?" he asked.

"Too slow in action, I imagine," Uncle Tom replied. "Howe, who succeeded Gage as British commander in Boston, did have the idea, but he failed to carry it out. Washington saw the wisdom of it soon after he got the lay of the land, and a part of his plan of assault was to have this hill complete the circle of his fortifications. So he sent General Thomas here with twelve hundred men one March night in 1776, and under cover of a friendly fog the earthworks were well thrown up by daylight, just on a line with where this tablet stands. Read what it says there, Marian."

And Marian, standing before the squat, unlovely memorial stone, read:

Location of the American Redoubts on Dorchester Heights
Which compelled the Evacuation of Boston by the British Army
March 17, 1776

"I can just see how it did, can't you?" said Roger. "Look here! It 's in a direct line with the State-House dome on Beacon Hill."

"Howe appreciated the fact, too," Uncle Tom told them. "He instantly prepared to attack the new redoubt."
"How? the same as he did Bunker Hill?" asked Jack.

"Perhaps," Uncle Tom replied; "though I doubt if that style of assault would have been tried again. But a March storm came on and spoiled his plans, and that night, upon due consideration, he and his officers determined to evacuate the town. Washington had outgeneraled him. General Thomas pushed forward his work and made a strong fort here, but before it was finished the British army, amounting to nearly nine thousand men, accompanied by over a thousand Tory refugees, embarked with supplies and luggage on seventy-eight vessels, and sailed away to Halifax. This was on Sunday, the seventeenth of March, 1776. From that day Boston was free."

"Hurrah for us, and good riddance to them!" cried Jack. "Why don't we put up a decent-sized monument here?"

"Probably something better than this crude stone-yard slab will some day rise on this height," Uncle Tom replied. "Indeed, certain public-spirited folk are already agitating the matter of a suitable monument on what they call the spot that marks the first American victory."

"Was it the first?" inquired Marian.

"Why, yes, it must be so," said Bert. "Don't you see we really were defeated on Bunker Hill. These fortifications drove the British off. Isn't that so, Uncle Tom?"
"That's about it," his uncle replied; "and no doubt the growing wave of Revolutionary remembrance will some day land a shaft on this sightly spot.

"Of one thing you may be sure, boys and girls," Uncle Tom told them, as they descended the hill and took the cars back to the center of town: "in this land of tablets, as this section of the old Bay State appears to be, the memorial will not long be lacking that shall indicate the spot where the guiding hand of Washington first showed its masterly grasp, and added to the protest of Lexington and the defiance of Bunker Hill the stern and compelling measures of Dorchester Heights."

BOSTON FROM DORCHESTER HEIGHTS.
From an old drawing made by Governor Pownall.
CHAPTER V

IN GREATER NEW YORK

FEW days later, while on the way to New York, Uncle Tom drew the attention of his young companions to the fact that, along the way, were numerous towns that possessed a stirring Revolutionary record.

"Newport, just off our route," he said, "was for three years occupied by the British, and, later, was the rendezvous for our French allies; Stonington, through which we passed, was attacked by the British early in the war; New London and Groton, its opposite neighbor, suffered terribly, as that tall monument on the hill will tell you; New Haven, Fairfield and Norwalk all showed marks of British invasions, in fire, shot, and sword. In fact, not one of the thirteen colonies lacks its Revolutionary record. From Maine to Georgia, from Portland to Savannah, you can study the record and the relics of those dreadful days of war. For in every colony the desire for independence followed fast upon the uprising of the Massachusetts minute-men, and the British plan to divide the colonies by distinct but related invasions laid the touch of war upon every section."

"How do you mean?" queried Bert. "Did they try to split them apart?"

"That was their plan," replied his uncle. "Orders went out from the English councils to occupy, overrun, and terrorize each section separately, cutting off the eastern from the middle and the middle from the southern colonies. That was England's intent; if her generals in America had been spry enough it might have succeeded."

"But we had Washington," said Roger.
"Yes, and he was more than a match for England's lazy leaders—he and Nathanael Greene," Uncle Tom assented. "You see, in these days of railroads, steamboats, and bridges, one cannot imagine this land without those modern conveniences. But your great-great-grandfathers had to get along without them. So rivers and mountain ridges kept people separate and at home; and in war, the possession of river fords and mountain passes was the key to every military situation."

"That 's so," said Jack. "If they couldn't wade the rivers or cross the mountains, they couldn't get anywhere or do anything."

"Exactly; communication means union, and this the British aimed to prevent. See here"—and Uncle Tom, with his blue pencil, hastily sketched on his folded newspaper a rough outline map of the colonies.

"Here to the north," he said, "is the St. Lawrence; here, almost at right angles to it, is the Hudson—they bounded New England north and west; further down, the Delaware and its tributaries cut away up into middle New York and its chain of lakes; Chesapeake Bay and its feeders break the Pennsylvania ridges; while, from Virginia to Georgia, the rivers seam the land from the sea beach to the hills. It was the British plan to control these rivers. The St. Lawrence they held by the occupation of Canada—a section which never shared the sentiment of independence. Ethan Allen's capture of Fort Ticonderoga —"

"In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!" put in Jack.
Uncle Tom smiled.

"Do you know what he is said to have said, Jack?" he asked.

"Why, I have said what he is said to have said. What else is he said to have said?" Jack demanded, in what Bert called "his reiterative protest."

"Oh, Uncle Tom! Did n't Ethan Allen roll out those splendid words?" cried Marian.

"Perhaps," her uncle answered. "But old Vermonters tell us that when the impetuous Allen, at the head of his ninety followers, roused the surprised commander at night, he called out to that gentleman roughly: 'Here! come out of that, you old rascal, and give us the fort, quick, or we 'll smoke you out like rats!'"

"Oh, I just won't believe that," Marian declared. "It does n't sound half as nice."

"I should n't wonder, though," Jack decided, with a nod of approval.

"Those Green Mountain boys were rough-and-ready fellows."

"They got the fort, anyhow," said Roger.

"Yes, and its capture brought into prominence a brave man who afterward went wrong," Uncle Tom added.

"I know," said Christine. "Benedict Arnold."

"The traitor!" cried Jack, lunging at the supposed renegade a vindictive dagger-thrust with his fountain-pen.

"Oh, but was he brave?" asked Marian. "I thought he was everything bad."

"His great crime must not blind our eyes to his great courage," Uncle Tom replied. "Benedict Arnold is one of the world's terrible examples of a man of great possibilities wrecked by his inability to conquer himself."

"But, talking of conquest," said Bert, "Quebec was n't much in that line, was it, Uncle Tom?"

"No, it was a sad failure," Uncle Tom answered, "although the march
"CAN THE YANKEES GET QUEBEC?"
of the Americans terrified the Canadians and set all the beleaguered town to asking, 'Can the Yankees get Quebec?' As a matter of fact, Washington's plans were excellent, but the obstacles in the way were almost insurmountable. Arnold's march through the Maine woods was a series of fearful hardships; Ethan Allen, over-hasty as usual, 'got rattled,' as you boys say, in an attempt to capture Montreal on his own hook, and, instead, was captured himself; Schuyler, an able general, was taken sick and had to give up the lead, and only Montgomery and his thousand men safely crossed the border and captured Montreal. Hurrying toward Quebec with but three hundred men, he found Arnold and his remnant beneath the heights of the city, and there a thousand bedraggled Americans attempted to storm the strongest fortress in America garrisoned by two thousand British soldiers. Leading a forlorn hope, Montgomery, in the teeth of a wintry Canadian northeaster, stormed one of the barriers and fell dead. Arnold, leading another forlorn hope against another barrier, had almost carried it when he fell wounded. A sortie of the British streamed out of the gates, one half of the Americans were captured, and the invasion of Canada ended in sorry defeat before the walls of Quebec."

"That was a shame!" cried Jack, pounding Bert's knee emphatically.

"Perhaps not," his uncle replied. "Through failure we learn the way to success. Out of this Canadian defeat came the caution, the patience, and the knowledge when and how to strike, that developed Washington into a great commander, and led the way to the final act at Yorktown."

"But all this has led us away from your map, Uncle Tom," said Bert, never forgetful of starting-points.

"That's so," said Roger; "what about the rivers?"

"The British held the St. Lawrence and were sure of Canada," said Uncle Tom, returning to his blue pencil and his outline map. "Thereafter, the American Revolution became a series of struggles for the possession of the Hudson, the Delaware, and the rivers of the South. We are all to be in New York for a while; suppose we sandwich a little patriotism between your days of pleasure, and take a look at the places made famous by this struggle for the Hudson and for the Delaware 'in the times that tried men's souls' here in America, when George the Third was king. What say you?"

And Jack, beating time, led off the company in an "under-the-breath" chorus of

"So say we all of us;
So say we all."

The "patriotic picnic," as the children, adopting Jack's convenient phrase, persisted in calling their search for Revolutionary reminders, gave them many pleasant outings in and about the metropolitan city. While Uncle Tom went at it systematically, he was too wise a cicerone to weary his young comrades by too much sight-seeing along one particular line. A day here, a day there, interspersed with other occupations, gradually covered the ground, and gave his "picnickers" an excellent idea of the Revolutionary operations in and around New York.

Taking an early Sunday-morning stroll, long before church hours, about that section of lower Broadway so busily crowded at all other times in the week, he brought the boys and girls to what he called the initial letter in New York's Revolutionary chapter. It was the tall building of red brick known as Number One, Broadway.

Uncle Tom pointed out the bronze tablet set in the front wall by the Society of the Sons of the Revolution. At once, as was their custom, the young people read the inscription aloud, in moderated chorus:

Here stood Kennedy House, Once Headquarters of Generals Washington and Lee.
On the Bowling Green Opposite, the Leaden Statue of King George was destroyed by the people
July 9, 1776, and later made into bullets for the American Army.

"Well, that does give us a good starter, and that 's a fact," said Jack.
"I did n't suppose you had any places marked like that in New York," said Roger.
"That 's fine."

"Oh, you must n't think Boston does it all, Roger," Marian retorted. "We know what to do, too."

"Wish I 'd been there! Would n't I have held the ropes, though, that pulled the statue over!" cried Jack. "Made into bullets, eh? Well, that was giving old Geory a Holland for a Gulliver, was n't it?"
"A what?" came the puzzled query, while even Uncle Tom seemed at sea.

And Marian said, "There! I know that's just another of Jack Dunlap's horrible misquotations. Where did you get it from?"

"Out of my extensive reading, ma'am," replied her brother. "Don't think that you monopolize all the education of the family, my dear."

Then Uncle Tom saw a light. He laughed aloud.

"Poor Jack!" he said. "He does hit the bull's-eye sometimes, though more by luck than skill, I fear. I recognize his quotation, Marian. It's a historic tit for tat; he means a Roland for an Oliver—those two famous paladins of old Charlemagne, you know. And it does fit this case; for, in melting George the Third into bullets for their own use, his American rebels returned him, with thanks; really a tit for tat, you see."

"Thanks, Uncle Tom," said Jack, bowing deeply. "You appreciate me. Praise from—"

"There, there! pray don't try another on us, Jack," implored his uncle. "It is really too brain-fatiguing to unravel them."

Standing in that famous spot about which centered so many of the dramatic happenings of old New York, they pictured to themselves that exciting day in Bowling Green, and the others that so quickly followed. In fancy they saw again the flying post-rider speeding down Broadway with his tidings of Lexington fight; they saw the volunteer companies parading the streets, drilling for liberty; they watched the Sons of Liberty drive off the carts which bore the arms and ammunition of the British reinforcements ordered to Boston, and Uncle Tom showed them where, at the corner of Broadway and John Street, the "confiscated" arms were stored.

In Trinity churchyard they stood before the tall brown shaft that rises "to the memory of those great and good men who died while imprisoned in this city for their devotion to the cause of American Independence"; they saw the one remaining building in City Hall Park which was one of those dreadful British prisons; they stood before the tomb of the hero of Quebec, the brave Montgomery, set in the wall of old St. Paul's; they heard again, before his touching statue in the shadow of the granite Post-office, the moving story of the bravery and death of glorious Nathan Hale; they looked from the broad Battery out upon the splendid harbor, while Uncle Tom traced for them on the hazy horizon, off toward Sandy Hook, the track of the king's fleet which brought, in the summer days of 1776, a great British army, with its hated Hessian contingent, for the subjugation of New York and the control of the valley of the Hudson.

"And that brings us," said he, "to our next notable conflict—the battle of Long Island. To-morrow or the next day we will cross the bridge and study that fight upon its own historic ground."

On the selected day, crossing the great web-like span of the Brooklyn Bridge, the party of investigators descended to the street on the Brooklyn side, and were soon speeding in the Flatbush "trolley" to the main battleground in Prospect Park.
As they went, Uncle Tom endeavored to give them a brief outline of the battle they were to study.

"The battle of Long Island," he told them, "was something in the nature of what the Western cattlemen would call a round-up. You know what that is, boys."

"Getting around the cattle and gradually driving them into a pen or corral, isn't it?" queried Bert.

"Yes; and in this case," said Uncle Tom, "the pen was the Americans' own line of fortifications, poorly constructed and barely half made and half manned, stretching almost from the Narrows to Hell Gate. General Howe, who had succeeded Gage at Boston—"

"And been driven out himself," put in Roger.

"Yes," commented Uncle Tom, "—had learned a lesson from his American foemen, and, when he came sailing in through the Narrows to the investment of New York, had a plan of action well thought out. He would land his troops on Long Island, surround the rebels in their lines, force them back by weight of numbers and discipline to Brooklyn Heights, and there capture them. From Brooklyn Heights he could command or bombard New York, precisely as the Americans did Boston from Dorchester Heights, and thus end the war."

"Only he did n't," said Jack.

"His game was well played," Uncle Tom continued, disregarding Jack's parenthesis. "Twenty thousand British and Hessian troops were landed, and marched by devious ways through the four passes which cut the lines of hills that stretched across the island. Many of those hills to-day are leveled, but you can see traces of what they then were, in Prospect Park, in Greenwood Cemetery, and on toward Jamaica. To these twenty thousand Washington could oppose scarcely ten thousand men, half of them militiamen and fresh volunteers. But some of the ten thousand were fighters,—the Marylanders especially,—and to-day they are remembered as the heroes of the fight.”

“What did they do?” asked Marian.

“I'll show you, my dear, on the very spot,” replied Uncle Tom. “The battle was really more a series of skirmishes or small engagements than a single conflict, but some of these were bloody and obstinate. General Howe’s plan worked well. By three roads his three detachments advanced upon the Americans, while he, with ten thousand troops, marching silently in the dead of night, and guided by a Tory farmer, got into the rear of the Americans on the Jamaica road. On the morning of the twenty-seventh of August, 1776, the Americans found themselves surrounded and in the heat of a desperate battle, the line of which stretched over ten miles or more of country. There could be but one result. Washington, fearing for New York as well as for the Brooklyn defenses, hurried over the river with reinforcements. Greene, who had studied and alone knew the ground, was too sick to move. No other general officer was capable of filling his place. Washington saw at once that Howe had the advantage of position, discipline, and numbers; and as he watched the fight, helpless to check or concentrate it, he wrung his hands in anguish and cried, 'Good God! what brave fellows I must lose this day!'"

"Why didn't he chip right in and lead them on?" asked Jack.

"Washington never was backward about rushing in and leading on when it would do any good, I assure you. But this was not a case where individual leadership could avail anything," Uncle Tom replied, as, leaving the cars by the splendid memorial arch, they entered the Park through the main gate, and hailing a Park carriage, rode to Sullivan Heights.

"Here," said Uncle Tom, as they stood among the cages of the "Zoo," "General Sullivan, who had command outside of the fortifications, was stationed; but down below us is the slope on which the fiercest fight occurred."

They descended the hill, crossed the Vale of Cashmere, and came out upon a swelling lawn where, in the face of a broken, tree-shaded knoll, Uncle Tom halted them before a bronze tablet.

"Line of defense, August 27, 1776, Battle of Long Island, 175 feet south. Site of Valley Grove house, 150 feet north," read Bert and the others.

"This is Battle Pass," explained Uncle Tom, "where the Hessians, twice repulsed, finally swarmed upon Sullivan's men, and drove or captured them, forced the redoubt, and combining with the rest of the British army, finally sent the defeated Americans flying for safety within the weak security of their Brooklyn defenses. So the round-up, you see, was successful, although some of the 'cattle' were obstinate."

"But what about the Maryland men?" asked Marian.

For answer, Uncle Tom led them back across the lawn to where, above a broad driveway, upon a slightly slope, rose a graceful shaft of granite and marble, topped with a polished globe.

"Read the inscription, Marian," he said, "while Jack gets his kodak ready. Is n't it a fine location? The monument was placed here in 1895 through the efforts of the Maryland Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, and is a beautiful shaft, well worthy a shot."

And Marian read:

"In Honor of Maryland's Four Hundred
Who on this Battle-field,
August 27, 1776,
Saved the American Army."

"How did they save it?" queried Christine, as Jack shot his kodak.

"By facing about here, and, against terrible odds, holding off the swarming enemy until the bulk of the Americans could withdraw. Then," said Uncle Tom, "surrounded, flanked, decimated, but heroic to the last, they surrendered, sacrificing themselves for their comrades and their cause."

"Good for them!" cried Jack, who had taken what he considered a most satisfactory picture. "Now let's get the battle-field from the arbor."
He did so, and added other pictures to his roll of films. For Uncle Tom and his companions "did" Revolutionary Brooklyn thoroughly, traversing the ground from the Cortelyou house, where the Marylanders almost "bagged" Cornwallis, to the points now swallowed up by the great and growing city, where hot and deadly fights occurred.

At last they stood beside the tall flag-staff on what, in 1776, was Fort Putnam, and now is called Fort Greene. At their feet stretched away Greater New York, the cities of Brooklyn and New York so merged into a tall and broken sky-line that the dividing river was obliterated and the great bridge seemed suspended above the crowding roofs. Under their feet, on the lowest terrace of the high redoubt, was the "tomb of the martyrs"—the vault in which are laid the bones of those brave but unfortunate patriots who died in the dreadful prison-ship Jersey, then moored near by in the Wallabout. This and the story of the battle seemed to tell of disaster, and Bert said soberly, "And it was a defeat, Uncle Tom?"

"Certainly a defeat, my boy," Uncle Tom answered; "but the battle of Long Island simply had to be fought. The defense of New York from Brooklyn was certain to be a failure if once a strong and disciplined force were concentrated on Long Island. Had General Howe followed up his success, the army of Washington would practically have been wiped out. But Howe was dilatory, as usual; and Washington, in a retreat that is one of his greatest achievements, carried the American army across to New York, and compelled his adversary to fight yet other battles before New York was wrested from 'the rebel grip,' as they called it."

"A retreat an achievement?" cried Roger.

"Assuredly," said Uncle Tom. "Two days after the battle of Long Island, Washington skilfully laid his plans, and while the British were preparing to gobble up the whole American army, in the teeth of a drenching storm and under cover of a friendly fog, in boats manned by Glover and his hardy Marblehead fishermen-soldiers, the American army silently stole away, with all their arms, guns, and military stores—"

"And General Howe was left!" cried Jack, his spirit recovering from the Long Island defeat. "Well,

\[ \ldots \text{he who fights and runs away} \]
\[ \text{May live to fight another day,} \]

I suppose, and G. W. did certainly know how to do that."

"He did, certainly," said Uncle Tom; "and military critics regard his masterly retreat from Long Island as sufficient to rank him among the great captains of the world."

The day in Brooklyn thus proved most successful, and Uncle Tom, following it up soon after with a visit to the field of operations on Manhattan Island, showed his young folks what he called "the sequel to Long Island."

He explained to them that Washington, expecting that Howe would bombard New York from Brooklyn Heights, advised the destruction of the city, but was overruled by Congress.

"At last, however," he said, "the British crossed the East River and landed at Thirty-fourth street. Here the Americans posted to oppose them became panic-stricken. They scattered like sheep, while Washington, distracted by their lack of courage, stormed at them like a Trojan, and would have sacrificed his life leading a forlorn hope in assault, had he not been urged away."

"Then G. W. could get mad, eh?" said Jack. "I thought nothing ever ruffled him."

"Nothing ever did, except cowardice," said Uncle Tom. "He could forgive even stupidity, but he had no patience with a coward."

"I know I should have been one," Marian declared.

"Oh, well, you're a girl," said Jack apologetically. "That does n't count."

"Does n't it, though, Master Jack?" cried Uncle Tom. "It counts very much sometimes, as history will tell you. And I'm pretty sure that if the test ever should come, my girls here"—and he passed an arm lovingly about his "gleams of sunshine," as he called Marian and Christine—"would prove as brave as did plucky Mistress Robert Murray, who at her comfortable house on Murray Hill (that's just about at Park Avenue and Thirty-seventh street, you know) detained the whole British advance by her cleverness, and gave Washington time to escape."

"How?" asked Christine.
“By forcing her hospitality upon General Howe and his officers, and fixing up a fine dinner for them, just as they were in hot pursuit of Putnam and the rear-guard of the retreating Americans.”

“Then they did retreat,” said Bert, while Marian clapped her hands.

“They had to,” Uncle Tom replied. “Howe’s force was too strong to resist, and Washington began another masterly retreat up the valley of the Hudson.”

“But about Mrs. Murray?” said Christine.

“Why, she made herself so agreeable at dinner,” Uncle Tom explained, “that while Howe and his officers were enjoying themselves, and their advance was halted, the whole American army got safely beyond the site of Central Park and behind their intrenchments here in Harlem.”

“Good for her!” said Marian, applauding again.

“What was there so very brave about that?” Jack demanded. “Anybody could give a dinner.”
“Put yourself in her place, and you’ll soon discover, my boy,” said Uncle Tom. “Courage does not only exist behind a bayonet or a sword: courage is the ability to be heroic in any way that faces danger and conquers circumstances.”

“But there was a battle here in Harlem, wasn’t there?” queried Bert.

“Right where we now stand,” said Uncle Tom.

He had come with his party by the cable-cars to One Hundred and Twentieth street and Manhattan Avenue. Then he had led them in the shadow of the walls of the new Columbia College to the heights at One Hundred and Nineteenth street, at the end of Morningside Park, and still surmounted by the ruins of an old block-house.

“Here ran the fight,” he said. “It was one of Washington’s plans to inspirit his men by a rapid attack on the advancing British. Had his instructions been followed out, and the British flanked, it would have proved something more than a skirmish; but the Americans had not yet learned discipline or obedience. They attacked in front instead of in flank, and the battle of Harlem proved but a temporary check, though a brave and gallant fight. There ran the line of battle—all along the ridge where the new college buildings stand, and up as far as Riverside Drive and Grant’s splendid tomb.”

“Say, that’s great, is n’t it,” Roger burst in, “to think that the tomb of our greatest soldier should be right here on a real battle-ground!”

“It is a telling coincidence,” assented Uncle Tom; “and here where we stand, on this rocky knoll at One Hundred and Nineteenth street, is a point made glorious by a hero’s fall.”

“Who was that?” asked Marian.
Our old friend Colonel Knowlton, who fought so bravely at the rail-fence on Bunker Hill, Uncle Tom answered. "From down yonder at One Hundred and Twelfth street and Twelfth Avenue, he fought the Highlanders, disputing the ground step by step, until forced back to this high bluff. Here, standing at bay, he and his comrade Major Leitch fell pierced with wounds, while the ever-ready Marylanders, charging in, routed the Highlanders and brought off Knowlton's command. Over this very bluff on which we stand Knowlton fell, fighting until death."

Leaving the heights of Harlem, the party crossed to the "Elevated," and riding as far north as One Hundred and Seventy-fifth street, set off to discover the remains of Fort Washington, considered when built, so Uncle Tom informed them, an unconquerable redoubt.

It proved really a journey of discovery, for even the polite policemen could not direct them; but accosting a bevy of small boys, they found their guide.

"I kin tek yer to the ol' fort," said the leader of the escort; "but yer can't find nuthin' there, unless yer dig."

Up hill and down dale, through fields, over a deep railroad cut, and into a grove he led them; and there, shaded by great trees, he pointed it out.

"That's the ol' fort," he said.

Uncle Tom was delighted.

"Right you are, my boy; here it is," he said. "Just enough of it remains to stand in proof. See, here are the sloping curtains, and here are two of the five corners—for it was a five-sided bastioned earthwork, you see. On this height it commanded the river, and with its outlying defenses had a circuit of six miles. It was indeed the inner citadel of all the northern defenses of the island, and was an excellent fortification. You can see that, after all these years of change, it is still wonderfully preserved in outline.

"General Howe," Uncle Tom explained, "sought to put into execution here the same tactics that had gained him Long Island. He did not dare to Kip's Bay is where the British landed at Thirty-fourth street — McGowan's Pass is just below Grant's tomb — Inclenburg is where Mrs. Murray lived — Snake Hill is just above Point of Rocks, where Knowlton fell — Fort Washington is where Magaw surrendered — Fort Lee, across the river, is where Washington watched the disaster.

attempt an assault on the fortifications on these broken heights; but, instead, would encircle the Americans, cut them off from the city on the south and the country on the north, and thus entrap them. Forced across the Harlem, the Americans intrenched themselves at White Plains, a few miles above here, in Westchester County. On and around the slope of Chatterton Hill, west of the little Bronx River, and near to the village, the two armies, each thirteen thousand strong, again stood face to face.”

“Much of a battle?” asked Jack.

“Howe expected it to be the decisive and closing battle of the war,” Uncle Tom replied. “But the Americans fought with so much spirit that they were able to retire with credit, and Howe, as usual, ‘waited for reinforcements.’”

“That means that he was whipped, then,” declared Roger.

“It was almost that,” said Uncle Tom; “for while he waited, Washington, by another of his masterly retreats, fell back to North Castle, five miles away, a high ground from which the British army could not dislodge him.”

“Good generalship,” was Jack’s patronizing comment.

“Indeed it was,” his uncle agreed. “Howe changed his plans and fell back to the attack upon Fort Washington, here where we stand. It had been held by the Americans after the retreat from New York, contrary to Washington’s desire, and was garrisoned by twenty-five hundred men.

“Seems to me they ought to have held it, if it was so strong a work,” said Bert critically.

“It was not well provisioned, had no water, and was not prepared to withstand a siege,” Uncle Tom explained. “But worse than this, treason was abroad. Dumont, the adjutant, one of our earliest traitors, deserted to the British with a correct plan of the defenses. At once the fort was surrounded by three storming-parties, who completely invested it, north, south, and east, while a war-ship in the river bombarded it from the west. Piece by piece the outer defenses were taken. The whole garrison was crowded into this little space where we stand, and where there is scarcely standing-room, as you see, for a thousand.”

“It is pretty cramped quarters, and that ’s a fact,” said Jack.

“Rescue was impossible; surrender was the only alternative. Magaw, the brave commander, made a brief but spirited resistance, and finally surrendered; while Washington, across the river yonder at Fort Lee, unable to help in any way, could only stand anxiously watching, a spectator of the defeat and capture of twenty-five hundred good fighting-men.”

“Say, I kin show yous the rock over at Fort Lee that Washington stood on and cried,” announced the little guide, who seemed well “up” in local history; and it would not have required much to send the whole party to the Fort Lee ferry to cross over and “see that rock.”
But Uncle Tom decided otherwise, and after picknicking awhile on the green slopes of the old fort, they all went cityward again.

"This Fort Washington scrimmage about settled things for New York, didn’t it?" Jack inquired.

"Yes; when Magaw surrendered the last American post fell, and New York became British," Uncle Tom replied. "Washington, crossing into New Jersey, conducted another of his desperate but well-planned retreats until he had put the Delaware River between him and his pursuers, who finally gave up the chase, boasting that they would catch him and end the war as soon as there was ice enough to cross the Delaware."

"Ah ha! somebody else crossed, if I know my history," said Bert.

"Right you are," said Jack. "Tell us about that, Uncle Tom."

"No use telling without seeing, I imagine," Uncle Tom replied. "Our New York campaign has been a success, even if we did have to retreat. What do you say to changing our base of operations, just as Washington did, to Philadelphia, and follow up his Jersey campaigns?"

"Cross the Delaware where he did?" asked Marian, delightedly.

"Surely," replied her uncle. "This is to be an object-lesson, you know."

"All except the ice," said Christine.

"We’ll take that with our soda," said Jack. "All in favor of campaigning in New Jersey, hold up their hands. Twice five is ten. All up, Uncle Tom. It’s a unanimous vote. The army will now move across the Hudson." And three days later it did.
A BRITISH INVASION.
CHAPTER VI

ALONG THE DELAWARE

Where Washington Crossed — The Wintry March — The Dash on Trenton — A Turning-point in the War — Princeton’s Battle-ground — In “the Lair of the Tiger”!

BROAD river, broken by a low island and spanned by a long, covered bridge; a green bank sloping down to the river’s edge, cut by a railroad track and a quiet canal stretching along peacefully side by side, and parallel to the river below; a plain wooden railway-station, and, across the ruddy road, an old-fashioned house faced with yellow stucco; further up the canal-side a little, low, gambrel-roofed house gray with age; across the river a group of scattered houses fringed about with trees—this is what, with a quick glance, the boys and girls took in as they descended from their brief railway journey from Philadelphia, in answer to the brakeman’s announcement: “Washington Crossing!”

“So this is the very spot where Washington crossed the Delaware, is it?” queried Marian, balancing herself on the railroad track and surveying the pleasant landscape. “Pretty place, is n’t it? Not at all as I imagined it—all icy and snowy and horrid.”

“I don’t see why they make such a talk about it,” Jack remarked critically. “What did they go poking through the ice for? What’s the matter with the bridge?”

“Oh, Jack!” came the chorus of protest; and Bert said, “Why, what are you talking about, old man? There was n’t any bridge here then—was there, Uncle Tom?”

“It looks old enough to have been here then, anyhow,” retorted Jack.

“Just think of this river with its winter current running swollen with ice,” said Roger, trying to picture the scene. “Br-r-r! how cold it must have been. Were n’t they Marblehead fishermen who got the boats across?”
“Yes, of Captain John Glover’s regiment,” Uncle Tom replied. “The same brave fellows who piloted Washington across the East River in that gloomy August retreat from Brooklyn manned the boats that brought their determined leader and his heroic men across this placid-looking stream on that pitiless December night.”

“Not very placid then, I guess,” said Roger.

“Anything but placid, Roger,” replied Uncle Tom. “Choked with ice, fringed with gathering snow, pelted with hail and sleet—that was the picture here as the dusk of Christmas fell in 1776. Come; let’s go over to the Pennsylvania side and do this crossing systematically—without the boats.”

They paid their toll to the skeptical bridge-keeper, who gruffly doubted even the existence of Washington, in reply to their eager query as to the exact point of crossing, and walked briskly across the thousand-foot bridge that unites the New Jersey and Pennsylvania sides of the Delaware.

To still their indignation at this startling official disbelief, Uncle Tom, as they walked, catechized them as to the steps that led up to this Christmas crossing of the Delaware; for he had already outlined the tale.
They answered well, for they had imbibed the whole story — the masterly southward retreat of the little American army after the fall of Fort Washington and the evacuation of Fort Lee — the chase through "the Jerseys" by Howe and Cornwallis — the shrewd manner in which Washington "corralled" all the boats along the river for miles, and crossed the Delaware at Trenton just as the British advance, led by Cornwallis, reached the bank — the failure of the British leader to get any boats for the crossing — his decision to occupy the New Jersey side of the river — Washington's decision to make a desperate attack at some weak point in the British line — the gathering of one section of his little army along the Pennsylvania bank of the Delaware, above Trenton, and their rendezvous at this very point upon which, so Uncle Tom told them, they were now looking, as they emerged from the cavernous mouth of the covered bridge and stood in the bright sunshine on the Pennsylvania shore.

"This was then called McKonkey's Ferry," said Uncle Tom. "It is now Taylorsville. It is nine miles above Trenton, and the approach to that town, on the New Jersey side, was by two roads, along which certain patriot farmers of New Jersey had volunteered to guide the Continentals."

Turning to the right, as they emerged from the bridge, Uncle Tom led his party a short distance along a pleasant village street, and then suddenly stopped before a roomy brown house which, so he said, was the home of Doctor Griffee.

And there, in Doctor Griffee's front yard, they saw before them a plain three-course, stunted monument of brown sandstone, upon the face of which

WASHINGTON GIVING DIRECTIONS FOR "CORRALING" THE BOATS.
Marian speedily read this inscription, placed upon the tablet upon its erection in 1895, by the Bucks County Historical Society:

NEAR THIS SPOT
WASHINGTON CROSSED THE DELAWARE
ON CHRISTMAS NIGHT, 1776.
THE EVE OF THE BATTLE OF TRENTON.

"But I want to see the very, real spot, Uncle Tom," said Christine. "This says 'near' it."

In reply to Uncle Tom’s knock at the door, a friendly lady and her pleasant-faced young daughter came from the house and cheerfully answered all the questions of the visitors.

The lady showed where the old road had turned toward the river, running through what was now her vegetable-garden. She pointed out the place where the boats gathered that cold Christmas day and where, later, a small monument had been raised on the river brink to mark the spot of embarkation.

"The stones of that old monument," their hostess told them, "are now worked into the foundations of the new monument up there by our front fence."

"And down here, just where we are standing, marched Washington’s men," said Uncle Tom, "each soldier carrying three days' rations and forty rounds of ammunition. They were almost barefooted; the blood from their wounded feet reddened the freshly fallen snow as they marched."

"Poor fellows!" said Christine the sympathetic.

"Perhaps they didn’t mind it so much as you think," said Jack. "They’d got used to it by that time, I guess; and besides, they knew where they were bound."

"So did some of the enemy," added Uncle Tom. "A Tory farmer saw what was up, and sent a note to the nearest British post—which happened to be the Hessian camp at Trenton. But Colonel Rahl, the commander, was having too good a time celebrating Christmas, and stuck the note in his pocket without reading."

"My! but that was a narrow escape," said Marian.

"It was a pitiless night—dark, cold, and dismal; the air was full of mingled snow and hail; the river was choked with floating cakes of ice. But Glover’s Marblehead men were ready; and so was Washington, even though the two other divisions that he had ordered to cooperate with him failed to keep the appointment."

"Why was that?" asked Bert.

"They thought the night was so bad that the march would not be made," Uncle Tom explained.

"H'm! guess they didn't know G. W. very well," said Jack. "He never went back on his word."

"He did n't this time, surely," Uncle Tom remarked. "The boats were manned; rank upon rank the soldiers passed aboard, and Knox, the Boston bookseller, with a big heart and a voice just as big, shouted out Washington's orders as he stood by his chief, who, right here where we stand, sat on an overturned and empty bee-hive anxiously watching the crossing of the troops—twenty-four hundred men with eighteen pieces of artillery.”

“Did n't he go over in the last boat, striking an attitude and with the Stars and Stripes wrapped around him, same as in the picture?” asked Jack.

“I can 't say, Jack,” Uncle Tom replied, “the painters made it so, and they ought to know, for both Peale and Trumbull were at Trenton. But, however he crossed, it was hard lines. The jagged ice floating down the river made progress slow and difficult; but the Marblehead men pulled and poled through it; the New Jersey farmers piloted the fleet across, and by three o'clock in the morning of December 26, the troops were all put across and Washington was ready to set them on the forward march for Trenton. Now we 'll see just where they landed.”

Once more they crossed the covered bridge, conversing pleasantly with the country doctor jogging along beside them in his travel-worn buggy, and passing over the canal stood beside the six-foot sandstone monument, in the face of which was set a bronze tablet stamped with the eagle and laurel badge of the Cincinnati.
Roger read off the inscription in a voice that combined dignity and despatch:

THIS TABLET IS ERECTED BY THE SOCIETY OF THE CINCINNATI IN THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY TO COMMEMORATE THE CROSSING OF THE DELAWARE RIVER
BY GENERAL WASHINGTON AND THE CONTINENTAL ARMY ON CHRISTMAS NIGHT OF
SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SIX

But while the rest sentimentalized over the event and its historic record, Jack hunted up a lady to whom the doctor on the bridge had referred him. Her family, it seems, had lived for years in the yellow house by the railway station, and she at once dropped her gardening tools and took Jack to the traditional “exact spot” where Washington had landed on the New Jersey side.

Jack hailed his party, and they hastened over the canal bridge and the railway track, and soon stood in the gentle dip where the old ferry road had led up from the river in Revolutionary days. Thereupon, Jack put them all aboard the little punt that lay moored to the bank, and, posing them in proper attitudes, pushed the punt off at rope’s length and kodaked them all with an enterprising snap-shot,—“caught in the act of crossing,” he said.

Then they all accompanied Uncle Tom to the little old gambrel-roofed house on the hill—the only witness of that famous crossing of the icy Delaware. They stood within the quaint, old-fashioned, heavily-timbered rooms and tried to reconstruct the historic scene—even to Washington taking a hasty bite in that very room at three o’clock in the morning, and immortalizing it so long as its frame shall last.

Standing beside the old house, Uncle Tom showed them about where the ferry road had climbed the rise. “Along this,” he said, “Washington’s tattered regiments slipped over the slushy ground to the Bear Tavern, a mile beyond the river. Here, by Washington’s command, the little army divided into two sections—one taking the river road and one the Pennington highway. Then, with the password, 'Victory or death,' they stole quietly on the unsuspecting Hessians at Trenton, nine miles away."

The visitors said good-by to the hospitable folk they had met at this pleasant riverside spot, and, taking the train to Trenton, dropped off at the Warren street station, and made a bee-line for the tall battle monument that overtops the roofs and spires of New Jersey's famous capital.

In the center of the town, at the junction of Warren and Greene streets, they came upon the tall white shaft that commemorates that day of surprise, of terror and of blood, of victory and of death.

"What a splendid place to set up a monument!" said Marian.

"And what a fine monument!" said Roger.

"It stands upon the exact spot," Uncle Tom explained, "on which young Captain Alexander Hamilton, of the New York artillery, planted his battery that winter morning and raked the startled Hessians. Just back of the monument on that middle street, where Fountain and Princeton avenues now cross, Washington stood to direct the fight."

"Upon his big white horse," put in Bert. "I've seen the picture, have n't you?—Washington at Trenton. It's a fine one."

"It may or may not be authentic," Uncle Tom replied. "The portrait painters had a way of labeling Washington's pictures as at this or that battle. The records say he stood over yonder—but whether on horseback or beside his horse, or whether he had a horse at all, just then, I am unable to say. The statue on top of the monument, you see, represents him standing. At any rate, he had plenty to occupy him. Trenton was one of the few battles of the American Revolution that was a town fight. Up and down the streets of this old city—then a wooden town of about one hundred houses—ran the short, fierce conflict. Here down Warren street, where we stand, Sullivan led his brigade in a resistless charge. His chief aides—Captain William Washington and Lieutenant James Monroe—fell wounded in the rush."

"Was that Monroe who was afterward President?" asked Bert.

"Yes, he won his spurs at Trenton, under Washington's own eye," said Uncle Tom. "Though wounded, both those brave officers sprang to their feet, and, manning two field-pieces, cleared the street of the Hessians, who after the first rush tried to repel the charge. General Mercer's men at the same instant dashed in a fierce charge down Greene street. Rahl, the Hessian leader, who had stumbled out of his house at the first assault, tried to rally his men down there on Greene street. But even as he was shouting, 'All who are my grenadiers, forward!' a bullet struck him down, and he was carried off to die. The lines of retreat were all closed. Stark, the Vermonter, swung around into State street with a resistless rush; Glover of Marblehead held the bridge across the creek; down yonder, on Hanover street, Forrest's six-gun battery unlimbered for action; resistance came to an end; the Hessians, huddled in an apple-orchard close beside what is now the new post-office building on State street, lowered
THE BATTLE-MONUMENT AT TRENTON.
their standards, grounded their arms, and Colonel Baylor galloped back to Washington with the joyful report: 'Sir, the Hessians have surrendered!'

"Hooray for our side!" cried Jack, smiting the old six-pounder that stands as a relic of the fight before the big bronze door of the battle monument. "Must n't Washington have felt glad?"

"He did, indeed," said Uncle Tom. "He caught a boy-soldier—one of St. Clair's aides—by the hand and cried, 'This is a glorious day for our country.'

"And so it was. It turned the gloom of defeat into the sunlight of victory; it gave heart and courage to the soldiers, to Congress, and to the people of the colonies; it established the fame of Washington as a leader and a soldier, and drew the attention and respect of Europe to the struggling and defiant colonists. Trenton was the dawn of a new day for America."

They passed the guardian sentinels at the portals, and stood within the monument. To a height of one hundred and thirty-four feet it springs into the air, topped by a heroic figure of Washington, his uplifted hand one hundred and fifty feet above the street-level. Guarding the doorway in the pedestal, on the right hand and the left, stand two bronze statues, typical soldiers of that historic day—the one a private of Glover's fisherman regiment from Marblehead, the other a gentleman private of the Philadelphia light-horse troop. Upon the four sides of the pedestal are bronze memorial tablets depicting, in relief, the crossing, the battle, the surrender, and the historical inscription. This latter Bert, before they entered, had read for the edification of the company:

This monument is erected by the Trenton Battle Monument Association to commemorate the victory gained by the American Army over the forces of Great Britain in this town on the 26th of December, Anno Domini 1776. Presented by The Society of the Cincinnati in the State of New Jersey.

They rode in the electric elevator to the top of the shaft; they stood upon the breezy outlook at the crown, and looked off upon the fair, broad landscape, while at their feet stretched in every direction the roofs and spires and smoking chimneys of the busy and growing city of Trenton.

"It means a good deal," said Uncle Tom, "this monument, reared in this city and above the streets through which the tide of battle surged that brief wintry hour so many years ago. This bronze statue above us may crumble into dust, but the man it represents will ever be one of the world’s immortals. Read us here, Christine, the lines that Richard Watson Gilder wrote in commemoration of the man and the day we are here considering:"

And Christine, taking from Uncle Tom’s hands the “Battle Monument” pamphlet he had secured, read, on that bright and breezy height, Gilder’s helpful and inspiring lines:

“Since ancient Time began,
   Ever on some great soul God laid an infinite burden:
The weight of all this world, the hopes of man.
   Conflict and pain, and fame immortal, are his guerdon!

“And this the unaltering token
   Of him the Deliverer—what though tempests beat,
   Though all else fail, though bravest ranks be broken,
   He stands unscared, alone, and never knows defeat.

“Such was that man of men;
   And if are praised all virtues, every fame
   Most noble, highest, purest, then, ah! then,
       Upleaps in every heart the name none needs to name.”

“The name none needs to name”—that ’s it,” said Uncle Tom. “We know him as the inspiration of all that is grand, all that is gracious, all that is good in American life; and here at Trenton his fame became glory. Now let us see the town.”

They descended to earth, and then, walking slowly through the town, they visited the points made famous by the famous fight: the spot where Washington stood to direct the assault, the house in which Colonel Rahl had too much Christmas, the place where he was shot, the house in which he died, the apple-orchard where the Hessians surrendered, and the points on the Pennington and the River road by which the Americans had entered and surprised the town. They examined and noted down the exhibits in the relic-room of the monument, and studying once again the graceful and towering shaft that rises upon the street that led straight on from gloom to glory, listened with real appreciation as Christine, at Uncle Tom’s request, read the second part of Mr. Gilder’s memorial poem. “It is the moral of the whole splendid story,” Uncle Tom declared. And so it was:

“Ye who defeated, ’whelmed,
   Betray the sacred cause, let go the trust;
Sleep, weary, while the vessel drifts unhelmed;
   Here see in triumph rise the hero from the dust!”
"All ye who fight forlorn
'Gainst fate and failure; ye who proudly cope
With evil high enthroned; all ye who scorn
Life from Dishonor's hand, here take new heart of hope.

"Here know how Victory borrows
For the brave soul a front as of disaster,
And in the bannèd East what glorious morrows
For all the blackness of the night speed surer, faster.

"Know by this pillared sign
For what brief while the powers of earth and hell
Can war against the spirit of truth divine,
Or can against the heroic heart of man prevail."

That evening, gathered about the ample hearth of the pleasant inn at Princeton,—for the night was cool,—the boys and girls listened while Uncle Tom again went over the story of the fight in the streets of Trenton, and showed how it led directly to the battle, a week later, fought on Princeton's streets and fields, and about the walls of its quaint and central college building.

"It is well for us to study the battles of Trenton and Princeton together," he said. "They were but ten miles apart; one followed fast upon the other,—in fact, one was the companion enterprise to the other."
"Sort of a two-part Revolutionary story, eh?" put in Jack.

"Very much so," Uncle Tom assented. "Cornwallis, angered at Washington's victorious dash on Trenton, gave up his trip to England, and marched against the American leader with eight thousand men, vowing to drive him across the Delaware or capture him and his army."

"Those British generals were always going to do such a lot," commented Marian.

"They planned well," said Uncle Tom; "but, as the saying is, they reckoned without their host."

"That's a fact. Washington was a host in himself," added Roger.

"Well, Cornwallis left this very town of Princeton on the morning of the second of January, 1777," Uncle Tom proceeded. "He pushed the American outposts before him as he approached Trenton, and, having cooped up Washington's army in the town, sat down to rest and to wait for the morning and for the reinforcements he had ordered to follow him."

"Did n't the British generals do a lot of sitting down and waiting?" queried Marian.

"Far too much for their own good," Uncle Tom replied. "And so it proved in this case. Cornwallis was certain that now he had Washington caged. But he had not."

"Well, I guess not!" cried Jack.
"Cornered, but not caged, the American commander thought things out in Trenton," said Uncle Tom. "His position was desperate, and he knew he was no match for the superior force of the British. He had no means for making a second crossing of the Delaware, still choked with floating ice. The British sentries were within speaking and hearing distance. But something must be done, and at once. A brilliant plan came to him. It was nothing else than to slip out of Trenton by the 'side door,' swing around to Princeton, fall upon and capture Cornwallis's garrison there, and then hurry on and destroy the British war stores at New Brunswick before Cornwallis could catch up with him."

"That was a fine plan," said Bert. "Did it work?"

"The first part worked admirably," Uncle Tom replied. "With his usual skill in strategy, Washington threw Cornwallis completely off his guard. He doubled the sentries, piled up the camp-fires, set men to work throwing up intrenchments, made everything appear as if he were preparing to defend himself in Trenton to the bitter end, and then quietly withdrew all his troops from Trenton, without arousing the suspicion of Cornwallis, and by daylight was down here, just south of Princeton village."

"Pretty good work, that," exclaimed Jack.

"Was n't it, though?" Christine assented.

"There were then in Princeton three British regiments and three companies of cavalry," Uncle Tom continued. "Two of these regiments and a part of the cavalry started for Trenton just as the Americans came into the town. As they crossed the bridge over Stony Brook,—which I will show you to-morrow,—the British colonel saw General Mercer and his Americans on the other side of the stream. He turned, recrossed the bridge, and then both sides raced for the best standing-ground—the high land above the stream. General Mercer got there first, and at once gave battle to the British. But the Americans had no bayonets, and could not stand against the British charge."

"Oh!" exclaimed Jack.

"General Mercer fell, mortally wounded; but as his men fled through the apple-orchard and past the Quaker church, Washington heard the firing and marched across to their support. Heading his troops, and with drawn sword, he dashed to the support of Mercer's men. The British wavered, turned, and fled down the hill; and Washington, massing his forces, chased the fleeing British through the town and into the main college building, where the other regiment had taken refuge. The Americans thundered at the college doors, and the British, after a show of resistance, escaped from the building and were soon in full retreat toward New Brunswick. That was the battle of Princeton."

"Pretty good for our side, too," said Roger.
“What did Brother Cornwallis say, I wonder?” queried Jack.

“There is no knowing just what he said, Jack,” laughed Uncle Tom. “What he did, when he found out how he had been fooled, was to hurry a detachment Princetonward. It came here to Stony Brook just as the American rear-guard was destroying the bridge by which the newcomers hoped to cross. So Washington again escaped a fight with a superior force, and while he retreated one way, toward Morristown, Cornwallis retreated in another direction, to New Brunswick. He had been outmarched, outgeneraled, and outwitted, and the victory rested with Washington.”

“But why didn’t G. W. pitch right in and wipe Cornwallis out?” grumbled Jack.

“Good gracious! Jack, do be satisfied, can’t you!” cried Bert. “Washington knew what he was about; and I guess he had done enough.”

“He certainly had done much—no man more,” said Uncle Tom. “His dash on Trenton and the affair at Princeton entirely changed the look of things for America. They forced Cornwallis to act on the defensive, and before spring set in not a red-coat was to be found in all New Jersey outside the regular quarters at New Brunswick and Amboy. Washington worried and badgered them all winter, never fighting a battle, but keeping the enemy continually on the anxious seat; and it is worth remembering that, after the surrender at Yorktown, Cornwallis himself expressed to Washington his admiration of his dash and strategy."

"Is that so?" said Bert. "What did he say?"

"'Your Excellency's achievements in New Jersey,' said Cornwallis to Washington, 'were such that nothing could surpass them.'"

"Well! that was kind," said Jack.

"It was recognition of real ability by an able man," said Uncle Tom; "for Lord Cornwallis was one of the best of England's fighting-men."

Bright and early next morning the visitors to Princeton were abroad; and thoroughly did they enjoy that fine old university town.

From the vantage-ground of the broad lawn of one of the great country houses on Stockton street, whose hospitable owner courteously did the honors as host and topographer, they overlooked the Princeton battle-field as it climbed the green slope from Stony Brook to the Quaker meeting-house.

Then they drove over the whole course of the fight. They stood on the graceful bridge which replaced the old one fought over and destroyed at the crossing of Stony Brook; they lingered beside the white stone that marks the spot where the brave Mercer fell; they stood within the very room in which that heroic leader died, in the old Clark house on the hill; they inspected Drumthwacket lodge,— "And well named it is, too, for a battleground house," they all declared,— into which the wounded British officers were carried; they stood beside the quaint and plain old meeting-house on the edge of the Quaker burying-ground, where Washington so gallantly rallied his men, and among whose unmarked graves is that of Stockton, the signer of the great Declaration.

Then, leaving the past, they walked into the living present, and "did" the university,— "the lair of the tiger," Jack called it, with rueful memories of lost battles on well-contested ball-grounds,— from old Nassau to the Brokaw memorial, and from Alexander Hall to the new and imposing library.

"Fine place to go to college, eh, Roger?" said Bert, as they all stood around the big cannon in the center of the campus, and heard from one of the black-and-yellow-capped students the story of the great college fight over that highly prized relic. "How would you like it?"

"It is fine," assented the prospective Harvard boy, dodging the direct question.

"An ideal place, I should think," Marian declared; whereat the black-and-yellow cap was gallantly doffed, and the whole party was escorted again to Nassau Hall, to see the class ivies that drape its time-stained front and sides.

"Now," said Uncle Tom, as in the exhibition-room of the old Hall they halted before George Washington's portrait in King George's frame, "we will go back to Philadelphia and follow this great man's next move; for it was close about that old Quaker city that the tide of war surged, as Howe and Cornwallis made a last attempt to capture Philadelphia and control the lands along the Delaware."

So, with a warm good-by to beautiful Princeton, with its hospitable estate-owners, its delightful inn, its Revolutionary sites, its college scenes, its tree-embowered home of an ex-President of the United States, its broad streets and its leafy ways, the battle-tourists fell back, as did Washington, upon Philadelphia, prepared to intercept Howe and Cornwallis, and "have it out with them," so Jack declared, "even if we get the worst of it."

"Never mind, dear boy," said Roger; "we have the advantage of our respected ancestors. We know just how the story turns out, you see."

And soon they were speeding back to Philadelphia, filled with enthusiasm for fresh Revolutionary enterprises.
THE COUNCIL OF WAR BEFORE MONMOUTH.

This is one of the bronze tablets encircling the monument at Freehold, N. J., commemorative of the battle of Monmouth. It represents the Council of War, held previous to the battle, in which Lee openly dissented from the plan outlined by Washington, and, because his advice was not taken, was sulky, mutinous, and almost treacherous on the battle-field.
CHAPTER VII

ON THE SCHUYLKILL AND THEREABOUTS

By Brandywine Creek—Old-time Obstacles—The Fight at the Ford and on the Hill—Where Lafayette was Wounded—The Chew House—The Street Fight at Germantown—A Baffling Fog—At Valley Forge—An Object-lesson in Self-sacrifice—At Monmouth Court-house—The Monument at Freehold—A Gallant Foeman.

"WELL, Uncle Tom, where to, and what 's first on the program?" Jack inquired, as he squinted a critical eye at William Penn, perched five hundred feet and more above the Broad-street asphalt, and wondered whether he could throw a stone over that elevated guardian of Philadelphia’s vast City Hall.

Uncle Tom sniffed the morning air.

"Breakfast, Jack, as soon as the girls are ready," he replied. "Then, it 's such a fine day, I think we 'll go over the hills to the Brandywine."

"That sounds bad, sir, very bad indeed, for a good temperance man," said Jack, shaking his head magisterially.

For answer, Uncle Tom clapped his nephew on the back, and literally ran him in through the hotel entrance, where the others stood laughing at these early-morning antics.

"Did you ever see two such children?" said Marian, loftily.

Then they all went in to breakfast.

This meal over, they walked leisurely around to the big Broad-street station, and were soon speeding off toward Chadd’s Ford on the Brandywine, twenty-seven miles from town.

The railway ride was a charming one. It ran through beautiful suburbs, between low hills and billowy rolling land, green as emerald, and clothed with oak and chestnut.

Uncle Tom drew the attention of his young people to this broken land, beautiful, indeed, under a bright spring sun, and developed almost to the verge of landscape-gardening, he admitted, but "mighty hard," he said,
"on a leader of troops who is in a hurry to get somewhere."

"Why, what 's to hinder him?" asked Bert.

"Nothing but the hills themselves, Bert," his uncle replied. "But you would find them obstacles enough if you were leading an army. To these successions of hills may be set down the slowness and difficulty especially of such a war as our Revolution. With none of our modern facilities for getting about, a campaign was a continual climbing up and down, by winding roads, over hills covered with forests, with no telegraph wires for quick communication, nor any search-lights to show the paths at night."

"Just as bad for the other side, too, was n't it?" queried Bert.

"Certainly; and in that fact lay some compensation," Uncle Tom admitted.

"What 's sauce for the goose —" Jack began, but Marian laid a hand upon her brother's lips.

"Now don't, Jack Dunlap!" she commanded; "you know you 'll get mixed up."

"Take this very campaign we are on," said Uncle Tom, with a side smile at Jack’s discomfiture. “Howe sailed from New York. Washington was in the dark as to his destination. Howe could n’t get up the Delaware because of obstructions. For six weeks the British were literally at sea, and Washington was held uncertain here in New Jersey before he could decide just what to do. To-day, the telegraph, the telephone, the railroad, and the search-light would render such delays and ignorance impossible. Suddenly, Washington heard that Howe’s expedition was far up Chesapeake Bay. Cæsar Rodney ——”

“Big and burly and bold and bluff,
With his three-cornered hat and his suit of snuff,
A foe to King George and the English State,
Was Cæsar Rodney, the delegate,” quoted Marian, with a bow to her uncle.

“Was that the man, Uncle Tom?” asked Jack.

CHADD’S FORD ON THE BRANDYWINE.

"The ford called Chadd’s was a shallow part of the creek where the stream is broken by a few spots of island."

“That ‘s the man,” replied his uncle. “He galloped about, gathering his Delaware militia, and sent the information post-haste to Washington. The general hurried down from his camp above Philadelphia, and on the eleventh of September, 1777, the two armies came together with a clash here at the place we are approaching — Chadd’s Ford on the Brandywine.”
"What funny names!" said Christine. "Why is it called the Brandywine?"

And for a wonder, as they all agreed, Uncle Tom had to confess, "I don't know."

"I do!" Bert announced with a great show of satisfaction. "I looked it up in Townsend's 'U. S.,' that book of curious facts about the United States that is in your father's library, Jack."

"Well, where did the name come from, Bert?" asked Uncle Tom.

"Why, you see there was a Dutch vessel came sailing up the river once, down near Wilmington, you know, and it was laden with brandy, only the Dutch folks called it 'brand-win.' The vessel ran aground and was wrecked, and the brand-win was all lost. But the Dutchmen, who liked the liquor, were so sorry for its loss that they spoke of the stream as the place where the brand-win was spilled, and from that, folks got to calling it Brandywine. And that is its name to-day."

"So it was a spill instead of a spree," said Jack. "That's better."

"Good for you, Bert," said Uncle Tom. "You investigate to some advantage. I shall remember your explanation."

They steamed down the slope from Brandywine summit (where the conductor pointed out the battle-ground) and dismounted at the sunny little wooden station labeled "Chadd's Ford." Then, crossing the road, they waited on the "hotel" piazza until their conveyance was in readiness. A bright boy who knew the landmarks accompanied them as guide. They took the long circuit that passed all the headquarters, climbed the hill to the inn where five roads meet at Dillworthtown, struck off to the left toward the Lafayette monument and Birmingham church, then swung to the left again past Chadd's house, came down the hill by the creamery, crossed the bridge at Chadd's Ford, and thus returned to the village tavern from which they had started. This completed the circuit, and gave them an excellent idea of the "lay of the land" whereon was fought the bloody battle of the Brandywine.

The Brandywine itself they found to be but a narrow stream, hardly more than a creek, winding in and out through the meadows, and bordered by slanting willows. On the further side the banks were steep, and in Revolutionary days, so Uncle Tom told them, these sharp, uneven banks were bordered by forests, and cut through only at fording-places for the rough roadways of old-time travel.

The ford called Chadd’s they saw was a shallow part of the creek below the breast of the dam, where the stream is broken by a few spots of island. Since 1829 a covered bridge, a small pattern of the one across the Delaware at Washington Crossing, has been the roadway over the creek; but in Revolutionary times the old “Baltimore pike” wound down from the steep bank above, plunged through the creek, and then rambled on through the meadows to Chester and Philadelphia.

“From Kennett Square, seven miles above Chadd’s Ford,” said Uncle Tom, “came Cornwallis.” Then he stopped. “Who else came from there?” he asked. “Who once lived at Kennett Square?”

“Who did, Uncle Tom? Any one we know?” asked Marian.

“Animal, vegetable, or mineral?” demanded Jack.

“Oh, I know,” said Christine suddenly. “Bayard Taylor.”

“Yes,” Uncle Tom nodded; “and the scene of his delightful ‘Story of Kennett’ is laid right in this section. You’ll enjoy reading it, now that you know its environment. Well, from Kennett Square came Cornwallis and Howe with seven thousand British and seven thousand Hessians, marching by different routes so as to strike at Washington in front and rear. The Hessian advance came upon the American advance here at Chadd’s Ford and drove it across the Brandywine. Washington, starting to force the enemy back, heard that Cornwallis had led his troops around and along the upper road that we took from Birmingham to Dillworthtown. At once he sent a strong force to the hill just west of the old meeting-house we stopped at, and there Cornwallis attacked them."

"Where the monument to Lafayette stands?" inquired Roger.

"Pretty near there," said Uncle Tom; "for there Lafayette was wounded. It was a sharp fight. The Hessians, who had forced the ford, hastened to Cornwallis's assistance, only to be held back by the left wing of the Americans. But the right wing had a hard time. It was forced from the field, and would have fled in a panic had not Washington galloped up with General Greene and reinforcements, brought order back, and held the field. Then the night came, both sides ceased fighting, and Washington, seeing that he was outnumbered, fell back in good order to Chester, while Howe made his headquarters in the big square house we saw on the hill. It had been a sharp fight, but the British found the Americans not so easy to handle, and they moved after them very cautiously. As Washington fell back, Howe advanced, and a few days after the battle of Brandywine he took possession of Philadelphia."
“Just what he was aiming for,” grumbled Jack. “Why could n’t we keep him out?”

“Washington had not men enough successfully to resist Howe, although he did not hesitate to attack him,” Uncle Tom explained. “Philadelphia had to go, but it proved only a hindrance and a drag to the British.”

“Well, it ’s a pretty spot here, defeat or no defeat,” Marian commented, looking all about her.

It was, indeed; and thoroughly did the young people enjoy the beautiful country and the delightful drive, so punctuated with Revolutionary memorials. Here stood Washington’s headquarters, old-fashioned, maple-shaded; there, near to it, Lafayette’s headquarters, among encompassing button-woods—“though why,” Bert criticized, “a volunteer aide-de-camp to the commanding general should himself have headquarters is what I don’t understand.”

“The sign says so, and so do the people,” Marian explained; “and I don’t see why you should doubt it.”

“I did n’t say I did, Miss Credulous,” replied her cousin; “I merely remarked that I did n’t understand why.”

Among the maples they noted the square house that served as the American hospital.

“There ’s blood-stains on the floor,” their young guide told them; “but I guess they ’re covered up by the carpet.”

They lingered before the Birmingham meeting-house, about which raged the hottest fighting, and looked over the wall into the old burying-ground, now plain as a threshing-floor, in which had been buried the British slain, their graves flattened by the British cavalry so that there should no tale be told of decimated ranks.

Last, but by no means least, they gathered about the modest terra-cotta monument raised to the memory of Lafayette, so the inscription told them, "by the citizens and school-children of Chester County." For, "on the rising ground a short distance south of this spot," so it informed the reader, "Lafayette was wounded at the Battle of Brandywine, September 11, 1777."

As they saw at least three such spots,—for over this question a fierce local feud exists,—the travelers were a little confused as to the facts. But, as Marian said, "We know Lafayette was wounded because he said so himself. Here's what it said on his monument; Uncle Tom copied it down for me: 'The honor to have mingled my blood with that of many other American soldiers on the heights of the Brandywine has been to me a source of pride and delight.'"

"That's what he said when he visited here in 1824," Mr. Eli Harvey told them, as they rested a while at his comfortable farm-house on the hill. "I've heard my grandfather say that while he sat swinging his legs on that there fence—a little shaver, then, he was—he heard Lafayette say he was wounded and carried under a tree over yonder. But, bless you, it's over half a mile from where that West Chester professor put up that there monument."

It was too deep a question to solve, so the children gave it up, and soon after were speeding cityward.

The next day they went to Germantown and Valley Forge—additional chapters, so Uncle Tom assured them, in the disastrous story of the Schuylkill campaign, in which Washington so stubbornly contested the British advance."

!WHEN LAFAYETTE RODE BY.

"My grandfather sat swinging his legs on that fence—he was a little shaver then," said Mr. Harvey.

The ever-present trolley carried them whisking up the broad and long highway known as Germantown Avenue, six miles from Philadelphia's City Hall, but now a part of the big Quaker city.
“In Revolutionary days,” said Uncle Tom, “this was a little village by itself, built on both sides of this single street. The battle was a running street-fight — ”

“Like Trenton?” queried Bert.

“Something of the sort. Come, let’s stop here. This is the central point of the fight”; and Uncle Tom stopped the trolley before a fine old stone mansion set far back among its great trees, and led the children through the broad gateway. Battered statues decorated the velvety lawn; broad walks swung around to the stables and back buildings.

“What is it?” asked Roger.

“This was called Cliveden,” replied Uncle Tom, “better known, because of the family which has owned and occupied the mansion for generations, as the Chew House.”

“The Chew House!” cried Christine. “Why, Uncle Tom! that’s where Hugh Wynne and Jack were in the fight.”

“Excuse me, ma’am, I’m not quite a Methuselah, thank you,” said Jack, looking a bit puzzled. “What fight? what Jack? and who’s the other fellow? Friends of yours?”

Christine laughed merrily.
"No, no; I mean in Dr. Mitchell's new story, 'Hugh Wynne,'" she explained. "Was n't this the house, Uncle Tom?"

"This is the house, my dear," Uncle Tom answered. "What an up-to-date girl you are, Christine! Dr. Mitchell's snap-shot at the fight is a fine one. I wish I had brought the book along. We could have read his description right here on the spot."

"Oh, we '11 trust to you, Uncle Tom," said Bert. "You tell it."

"Yes, spin us the yarn," echoed Jack.

"I 'll try to," Uncle Tom replied. "Howe, you know, was in Philadelphia. Washington was in camp fifteen miles to the northwest. He determined to make a dash down here on the British camp at Germantown, where the bulk of Howe's army was stationed. You must imagine this fine avenue a long, broken line of small gray-stone houses, as Dr. Mitchell tells us, set in gardens on each side of the highway, with here and there a mansion like this home of the Chews. This was the upper end of the town.
Down the street, near the Wayne Junction railway station, was the lower end, not far below the market-place. The British stretched all along here. Just across from where we stand a British regiment was encamped. Washington planned his surprise and attack admirably, but things did n't work out just as he intended."

"Somebody blundered, I 'll bet! " cried Jack.

"Yes, some one did blunder, and a dreadful blunder it was," said Uncle Tom. "Down this street, on the other side, Mad Anthony Wayne came charging gallantly; down this side swept Sullivan and his men. Together they routed the British, and sent them speeding for their lives down this very street. A thick fog came drifting in from the east, and covered friend and foe. Lord Howe was caught in the rout, and hurried off with the rest, protesting and storming."

"Hey! glad of that!" cried Jack the partizan.

"Down this main street they came, with Wayne and Sullivan at their heels. The British regiment across the way made a bee-line for this big house, and barricaded themselves inside it. At once a part of Wayne's division laid siege to the Chew House, but the British could not be driven out, and kept the American besiegers busy for an hour. Meantime, the rest of the American advance pursued the fleeing British; Greene’s men, swinging around the town, were to take the British in the rear at the market-place; but the fog bothered them, and they were just too late: for, in the uncertain light, the American right and left, coming together, mistook each other for enemies, and fired into each other’s ranks, demoralizing the whole army.”

“How dreadful!” exclaimed Marian.

“How stupid!” commented Bert.

“Not so stupid as you think, my boy,” said his uncle. “A fight in a fog is even worse than one in the dark. Fog mystifies and magnifies. Of course this blunder delayed things. Greene arrived just too late. Cornwallis dashed up with reinforcements, the British made a desperate and successful stand, and Washington reluctantly ordered a retreat.”

“How mean!” cried Roger. “Just as the battle was won.”

“It was all the fog’s fault,” explained Bert.

“Yes, sir,” said Jack; “if it had only been a bright morning, we’d have had ’em.”

“It was a well-planned battle,” said Uncle Tom; “and had things worked together as Washington intended, it would have been a surprise and a defeat for the British. As it was, it was one of those happenings in war which show how easily a victory almost won may suddenly become a defeat.”

“Then if Wayne’s men had n’t stopped to hammer against this Chew house,” said Bert, “the battle might have been a victory for us.”

“Yes, that and the sad mistake of friend mistaking friend for foe,” said Uncle Tom.

“I think that was the worst of all, was n’t it, Marian?” said Christine: “Where did it happen — near here, Uncle Tom?”
"Down the street, in front of what is called the Johnson house; I'll show it to you," said Uncle Tom.

He did so, after they had first walked about the broad grounds of the fine old Chew mansion, which had so nobly stood a siege. They saw, too, the Billmeyer house, upon the steps of which Washington stood to direct the fight, and the half-dozen other survivors of that battle in the fog. Then they went back to town, and after an early lunch took the train to Valley Forge.

For of course they must go to Valley Forge. "It has more of pathos and sentiment for us," said Uncle Tom, "than any other place in the whole American Revolution."

"But it was n't a battle-field," said Bert.

"It was a moral battle-field, my boy," Uncle Tom replied, "and a tremendous victory for Washington and the right. It was winter quarters, but not rest. While Howe in Philadelphia was wasting valuable opportunities for action, Washington, among the snow-covered huts of Valley Forge, amid privation, suffering, and poverty, was making men and heroes out of his barefooted, ragged tatterdemalions. He put his soldiers to the hardest of tests, and nobly did they stand the trial. Valley Forge was America's object-lesson in self-sacrifice."

At the little wooden station by the Schuylkill, twenty-one miles from Philadelphia, even the plain sign-board with the words "Valley Forge" gave them a peculiar thrill, as they followed the station-agent's directing finger and crossed the tracks to the headquarters—the old Potts house, which Washington occupied during that bitter winter at Valley Forge.

The house, which is now under the care of the Centennial and Memorial Association of Valley Forge, they found to be in excellent preservation, well stored with Revolutionary relics, and in charge of a preoccupied superintendent and his obliging daughter.

"Where are the huts?" asked Roger.

"Up the hill—what is left of them—only a faint mark of the foundations—a mile and a half from here," the girl explained.

They were all astonished at this.

"We always hear about the army as 'huddled in the huts at Valley Forge,'" said Bert. "I thought that meant they were just huddled about the headquarters house, in a little space."

They found it anything but a little space as they climbed the hill for a visit to the different landmarks. Uncle Tom explained to them that Washington had ten thousand men in camp—quite a force to provide for. Then, too, he told them, Valley Forge was an intrenched camp with redoubts and forts, for Washington expected an attack by the British at any moment.

"It did n't come, though, did it?" queried Bert.

"No; Howe was having too good a time in Philadelphia," Uncle Tom replied. "Valley Forge, you see, lies in a cup-like valley, defended by its half-circle of hills and by the Valley Creek and the Schuylkill. Half a mile above the mouth of the creek was the old forge that gave the village its name."

They drove up the hill to the spot, near Port Kennedy, where some of the huts had stood, only a few faintly marked foundations remaining; they located the Star redoubt, and also Fort Huntingdon and Fort Washington. They stood on the spot where Baron Steuben drilled the men into soldiers; they saw the houses that served as headquarters for Knox and Lafayette and De Kalb and Wayne; they drank from the Washington spring; explored Washington's cave; crossed the Sullivan bridge; photographed themselves about the War Department cannon, and departed for Philadelphia, deeply impressed with all the interesting sights and all the thronging memories of Valley Forge and its historic winter of 1777-78.

But Jack said: "Well, that's two defeats and a freeze. That's pretty hard on us, Uncle Tom. Can't you throw in a victory to brace us up?"
"That's just what I am going to do for you, Jack," Uncle Tom replied. "We'll take in Monmouth on our way back to New York."

They left Philadelphia the next morning, and changing cars at Monmouth Junction, branched off for Freehold, "where the battle was fought."

"Why is it called the battle of Monmouth, then?" asked Marian.

"Because above the present town of Freehold stood the old courthouse. It was the shire or county town of Monmouth County," Uncle Tom explained, "and as the battle was fought along the court-house road, it has always been called the Battle of Monmouth."

In a green, triangular park at the junction of Court and Monmouth streets in the town of Freehold, they found the battle-monument—a graceful and beautiful shaft of Concord granite on a Quincy base. The height from the base to the crown of the "Liberty Triumphant" statue that tops the monument is just one hundred feet, while the five bronze tablets by the sculptor Kelly, descriptive of the battle and encircling the shaft, are wonderfully graphic and artistic.

The children were all delighted with the monument and clamorous for the story of the fight—"Molly Pitcher and all," they demanded.

So, after lunch, Uncle Tom found a conveyance, and they drove out to the battle-field as far as the Old Tennent Church, three miles from the town. As they went, Uncle Tom briefly told the story of the fight.

"It was really a pitched battle," he explained, "and the methods employed by Washington were but another proof of his military skill. When the news of the French alliance filled America with joy and set the frost-bitten camp at Valley Forge to huzzaing, it set Sir Henry Clinton, who had succeeded Howe as British commander, to thinking deeply. As a result he decided to give up Philadelphia; and with all his troops and a baggage-train twelve miles long, he set out on his march across New Jersey, to unite with the British force at New York."

"There's your first break, Jack," said Roger. "How is that for a bona fide retreat?"

"That's all right," said Jack; "go on, Uncle Tom."

"Washington wished to prevent his doing this, and to keep him occupied until the French allies arrived," Uncle Tom continued.

"How about that baggage-train twelve miles long," said Jack. "Don't you think Washington would like a chance at that?"

"No doubt. Anyway, he tried for one," Uncle Tom replied. "He hurried his army away from Valley Forge and got upon Clinton's track as soon as possible. In the council of war, shown on one of the monument tablets, the course of action was debated, showing a strong difference of opinion between Generals Washington and Lee. But Washington determined to fight, and on June 28, 1777, he came upon Clinton's army here on the plains of Monmouth. He sent Lee ahead to begin the attack, but Lee was — "

Uncle Tom paused.

"Was what?" asked Bert, as his uncle hesitated — "too slow?"

"Worse — if not a traitor, at least traitorous," replied Uncle Tom. "Charles Lee, adventurer, is one of the puzzles of the Revolution. At any rate, he did not do as directed, and as Washington reached the old Tennent Church, to which we are going, he met men running the wrong way, who told him that Lee was retreating.”

“What did G. W. say to that?” asked Jack.

“He was thunderstruck. Spurring his horse ahead of all his staff, he met the retreat in full flight,” Uncle Tom continued. “This is one of the great historic scenes in which Washington, the self-contained, gave way to anger. He burst upon the pompous and conceited Lee with such a storm of wrath that for once the soldier of fortune was struck speechless. He withered under the words of his chief, and then Washington turned his men about, charged upon the enemy, and drove them back, checked and defeated.

“When night came, Clinton left his dead unburied on the field and stole away so silently that the Americans, close at hand, did not discover the flight until next morning. Then he pushed on to New York, and Monmouth was the last real battle fought on Northern soil. Valley Forge had made it possible.”

“What became of Lee?” asked Roger.

“Probably nothing more would have been said to him,” answered Uncle
Tom, “for Washington’s anger was as brief as it was hot, and speedily changed to courtesy. But Lee sulked. He wrote an insulting letter to Washington, was tried by a court-martial, and finally dismissed from the service. Students of history to-day are inclined to charge him with treason, and even to say —”

“Oh, see! what’s that—up on the railroad track?” broke in Marian.

“Landmark number one,” said Uncle Tom. “Molly Pitcher’s Well. Who knows her story?”

“She’s the woman we saw on the monument tablet who served the gun after her husband was killed,” said Marian. “But what is the well?”

“It is claimed by good Freeholders that Mistress Molly’s house stood back there, and that this well, beside the railway track; was in front of the house. She was drawing water from this well for the American soldiers, so it is said, when her husband was shot down, and she, dropping her pail, sprang to the cannon and filled her dead husband’s place as gunner.”

“Good for her,” cried Roger.

Further along the road, beside a weather-stained house, they saw a weather-stained sign-board. “Spot where Washington met Lee,” it said.
"Where he spotted him, I guess," said Jack. "Did n't he swear, Uncle Tom?"

"Tradition says that he did," Uncle Tom replied; "but at the trial of Lee, no witness, in telling the story, put any profane word in Washington's mouth, nor does Lafayette, in his memoirs. All accounts, however, do say that he was a spectacle of 'sublime wrath.'"

"That's hot enough, I guess, without the swear words," said Jack.

They passed the spot, marked by its sign-board, where Washington first came upon the retreating troops and turned them back; they borrowed the keys of the old Tennent meeting-house and entered and inspected the quaint and ancient edifice; they strolled about the old churchyard and paused to read the inscriptions above the patriot graves. Upon one that marked the resting-place of the brave Monckton, one of the heroes of the fight, a gallant British officer, they read this:

_Hic Jacet_ Lt. Col. Henry Monckton, who, on the plains of Monmouth, June 28, 1777, sealed with his life his duty and devotion to his king and his country. "Courage is, on all hands, considered as an essential of character." This memorial erected by Samuel Fryer, whose father, a subject of Great Britain, sleeps in an unknown grave.

And even Jack the partizan said nothing. They paid to a gallant foeman the tribute of silent respect.

Then, returning to town, they rode to New York. But the spirit of investigation had by no means cooled. There were other battle-fields to see, other Revolutionary memorials to study.

"Monmouth was pretty good as a victory," Jack commented, as they all sat in his father's library talking over the trip. "But I see that some histories put it down as a drawn battle because both parties rested on the field. See here, Uncle Tom, you promised us a real victory. Just trot it out, please."

"With all my heart," Uncle Tom replied. "If you'll take a trip up the Hudson with me I'll show you a victory that was a victory — battle, defeat, surrender — everything you could wish for. Shall we go?"

"Sha'n't we, though?" cried Jack. "But where?"

"Well, first, up the Hudson," Uncle Tom replied. "We shall find enough to see, on both sides of the river, to make the sail to Albany almost a Revolutionary biograph."

"Oh, that will be fine," said Roger. "I'd like to go up the Hudson. Is it better than the Charles?"

"Better than the Charles! Just hear the Boston innocent, will you," laughed Jack. "Why, old fellow, the Charles is a trout-brook alongside of the Hudson."

"Well, trout-brooks are good things," declared Bert, courteously.

"Yes, for trout; but when you come to scenery — " began Jack.
"We 've got it on the Charles," added Roger quietly. Jack simply shook his head helplessly. He had no words suited to the requirements of this case.

But Uncle Tom said: "Everything in its place, boys. The Charles is delightful, historic, unique. It is the Charles. The Hudson is—the Hudson; and what that means, I 'll show you on the way up to the field of victory that was a victory. What was it—where is it?"

"I know!" exclaimed Christine.

"I know," cried Bert.

And both, with one voice, shouted "Saratoga!"

"Saratoga it is," said Uncle Tom, nodding approval. "Day after tomorrow, on the day line for Albany. Is it a vote?"

"It is, it is,—unanimous," came the answer. And the second day after found them all on the Hudson River day steamer, en route for Albany and Saratoga.
THE DEATH OF COL. MONCKTON.

From Kelly's tablets at Freehold. Wayne, the American, is on horseback leading the charge — Monckton, the Englishman, lies on the ground.
Here are more riches than any fabled Cathay could boast, said Uncle Tom; 'here is a free metropolis more powerful than any Eastern tyrant's capital.'
CHAPTER VIII

UP THE HUDSON

"Roger and Jack," said Uncle Tom, "here comes in the point I wished to make in your discussion yesterday. The Hudson is—the Hudson; and, in its way, this picturesque and noble stream plays as important a part in the story of the American Revolution as does that historic road from Cambridge to Concord upon which we first set out on our battle-field pilgrimage."

They were grouped well forward on the Albany steamer, headed up the Hudson, and just steaming away from the Twenty-third-street pier.

Roger was still disposed to question Uncle Tom's statement, and even Christine seemed inclined to support the Boston boy in his criticism.

"Oh! Uncle Tom," she said, "think of all the things we saw along that lovely drive, from Leif Ericson to Longfellow!"

"Explorers, poets, patriots—all these I can show you along the Hudson," Uncle Tom declared. "This river is notable for its historic, quite as much as its natural, picturesqueness. Verrazano the Florentine, Gomez the Portuguese, Hudson the Englishman, Block the Dutchman—one after the other, these explorers headed for Cathay over the very course we are sailing, and labeled this broad river according to their own nationalities."

"Cathay? That's Marco Polo's country, that Noah Brooks wrote about in "St. Nicholas," is n't it, Uncle Tom?" Marian inquired.

"But that's China," said Jack. "How under the sun did they expect to get to China this way? Walk?"

"Why, don't you know," said Bert, "they thought the Hudson was a strait or something—a short cut to China; did n't they, Uncle Tom?"
“Yes—and see! it was a short cut to something better than China,” Uncle Tom said, sweeping his hand toward the great city they were leaving. “Here are more riches than any fabled Cathay could boast; here is a free metropolis more powerful than any Eastern tyrant’s capital. And all this because of the American Revolution, in whose stirring story this river played its important part. It has seen massacre and merrymaking, battle and pageant, State-building and wonder-working. In Albany met the first Congress of the Colonies; in the shadow of the Palisades sailed the first steamboat. It has helped to make both our history and our literature, and the greatest victory and the greatest crime of the American Revolution have, alike, forever linked its name to the republic’s struggle for freedom.”

“I suppose you mean Saratoga and the treason of Arnold, Uncle Tom,” said Roger.

“Yes, both of them were Hudson River incidents,” Uncle Tom replied.

“Well, you’re making out quite a case for us, Uncle Tom,” said Bert.

“Let me give you details,” his uncle continued. “From source to mouth, the river is fairly bordered with Revolutionary beacon-lights. Upon its head waters was planned the earliest offensive movement of the Revolution, following close upon the heels of Lexington—I mean the capture of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, in May, 1775. At its mouth was played the last act in the long eight-years’ drama—the evacuation of New York by the British in November, 1783, which closed hostilities and rid the land of the red-coated troops of King George. Up this river went Montgomery and his men to join the forces gathered for the invasion of Canada; and just beyond where we now are sailing, Washington and Rochambeau met to plan out the campaign that ended in triumph at Yorktown. Irving, the biographer of Washington and the annalist of the Revolution; Bryant, who wrote ‘The Song of Marion’s Men’; Cooper, the author of ‘The Spy’—the noblest novel of the Revolution; Willis and Poe and Morris and Drake, to say nothing of later writers, dear to you as the favorites of to-day, have all celebrated this noble river in song or in story, and made its Revolutionary sights and scenes their theme. In fact, boys and girls, if Massachusetts Avenue was the roadway to liberty, the Hudson River was its waterway.”

“Uncle Tom, you’ve proved it! I’m proud of you, sir!” and Jack, who was a loyal son of New York and an ardent admirer of the Hudson, applauded his uncle vigorously.

“But think of all the Tories around here!” said Bert. “I’ve read ‘The Spy’ too, you know.”

“Well, how about Tory Row?” cried Jack. “That was right along there by Washington’s headquarters in Cambridge, I believe.”
"No use, boys," said Uncle Tom. "You can't advance one over the other with success. There were patriots and traitors in every section. That's what made the Revolution, you know. And speaking of headquarters, this river abounds in them. Washington "stopped" all along here, you see."

"Stopped? I should say he was kept a-going," said Jack. "Seems to me the railway sign we see in so many depots would have about hit him: 'No Loitering about this Station.'"

Bert was disposed to resent this as a reflection on Washington, but Uncle Tom said: "You must admit, though, that he moved on to good advantage. It was the Howes and the Clintons who did the loitering. And almost all these headquarters that are standing to-day are associated with some marked event in Washington's career. Over yonder, to the west of us, among the New Jersey hills, lies Morristown,—settled by New-Englanders, Roger,—the center of Washington's aggressive operations after the battle of Princeton. In 1777 Washington made

THE HUDSON AT CLAREMONT HEIGHTS.

The Hudson was the waterway to liberty.
his headquarters there. He was there, too, in the winters of 1779 and 1780. The old house is still standing—a relic and a museum. A few miles above us here, just to the east of the river, on Broadway in White Plains, is the house he occupied at the time of that disastrous battle. Twenty miles up the river, and a mile or so to the west of it, stands the old, old house in Tappan which was his headquarters at the time of André's capture and execution; while at Newburgh is the most famous and best-preserved of all his headquarters in this region. At Dobbs Ferry, Peekskill, West Point, Fishkill, and New Windsor are houses or traces of houses occupied by the great Continental chieftain at important periods of our Revolutionary history. In fact, this noble river is associated with Washington's time of stress in the history of our land even more than is the Potomac with his days of peace."

WASHINGTON'S HEADQUARTERS, TAPPAN.
Two miles west of Sneden's Landing on the Hudson. The house was built in 1700 and was occupied by Washington at the time of André's execution. This is the rear of the house. The front has four windows and a Dutch half-door.

Without harping too much upon the one subject,—for there are other things to see along the Hudson besides Revolutionary landmarks,—the boys and girls found continuous occupation for eyes and ears, following Uncle Tom's index finger and keeping the run of his comments and identifications.

It was a beautiful morning. The sun glistened and sparkled on the ruffled river and lighted the long, dark escarpment of the Palisades—nature's own earthworks, now threatened with overthrow by man. The young people knew in a general way the value of the Hudson River to the American patriots at the time of the great Revolution, and that its loss meant the absolute separation of New England from the Southern colonies—an object kept continually in view by the British. So, as they followed Uncle Tom's
ON THE BANKS OF THE HUDSON.

"With Grant's massive mausoleum as a landmark."
words, they recognized that the river, between whose banks they were sailing northward, was really, as he said, liberty's historic waterway, dotted with stations where now success, now failure, met the boys of '76.

"But we really did hold the river, did n't we?" asked Bert.

"North of West Point, we certainly did," Uncle Tom replied; "and thus, to a certain extent, carried out our desires. But the struggle for the lower Hudson was long and often bloody, though no important battle was waged on its banks."

"How about Stony Point?" queried Bert.

"That was an assault rather than a battle," Uncle Tom explained; "and, though a brilliant affair, it was only a sort of interlude. We 'll see the spot up above here. It 's well worth noting."

"It 's nearer to West Point, is n't it?" Marian asked.

"Yes," her uncle replied; "and within the line of the American defenses. This part of the river over which we are sailing washed what was known as the neutral ground — the section between the British outposts at Spuyten Duyvil and the American outposts below Peekskill. Yonkers, just above us, was in the heart of the neutral ground, overrun by the guerrillas of either side — cowboys and skinners, of whom you have read in Cooper's 'Spy. '"

"Which was which?" asked Roger.

"The skinners were the American marauders; the cowboys were the British," Uncle Tom replied; "and it is a question whether they did not do more harm than good to their respective sides. What they were after was plunder, and, when it came to getting booty, friend suffered as well as foe."

Mile by mile the steamer plowed her rapid way up the Hudson, now with Grant's massive mausoleum as a landmark, now with the long line of the Palisades as a side-wall. Upon the western or New Jersey side they noted the spot where Hamilton fell beneath the deadly bullet of Burr,— "Both of them Revolutionary heroes," Uncle Tom reminded his young companions.

"Can we see the place now?" asked Christine.

"I don't think so," said Uncle Tom. "It is over there, just south of the West Shore ferry house; and above, on the hill, still stands the old King house, which was Lafayette's headquarters after Brandywine battle. It 's a summer resort now, I believe. Look further up the river. Those big oil works are at Shadyside. It used to be called Bull's Ferry, and that ridge of rocks, between the river and the road, was Block House Point." And then Uncle Tom told them the story of Anthony Wayne's big cattle raid, which came so near to being a battle, and gave to André a theme for a comic poem — the "Cow Chase."
"I know that," said Bert; "does n't it end this way?

"And now I 've closed my epic strain;
    I tremble as I show it,
Lest that same warrior-drover Wayne
    Should ever catch the poet."

"And he did catch him, did n't he, Uncle Tom?" cried Jack, excitedly.
"Yes; the comedy had a tragic ending," said Uncle Tom, "for the very day it was printed André was captured as a spy by men belonging to Wayne's command; Wayne's name signed the young poet's death-warrant; and Wayne's troops executed the spy, above here, at Tappan."
"Poor André!" said sympathetic Christine.
"Poor nothing!" responded Jack, bristling up. "He was a spy. It served him right."
But Uncle Tom interposed a restraining hand. "Not time for that discussion yet," he said. "The André region is further up the river. Look! over there, just above Block House Point, is Fort Lee, seated high amid her beer-gardens."
"More dangerous than British bullets, Uncle Tom," said Bert, who was a strong temperance boy.
"Quite right, quite right, Bert," replied Uncle Tom, bestowing a look of approval on his nephew. "I have no doubt that from the present occupation of the crags of Fort Lee, yonder, have come more trouble and misery than were ever caused by Cornwallis and his army, when they swooped down from Alpine Landing and sent Washington scurrying across country, fleeing, but unbeaten."
They had already passed the heights of Fort Washington, on the New York side, and crossed the mouth of Spuyten Duyvil, where Jack sought to arouse the ghost of the luckless Anthony Van Corlear by sounding an imitation bugle call above the watery grave of Peter Stuyvesant's defiant trumpeter. As they rounded the pier at Yonkers, Marian clamored for Washington's love-story, which Uncle Tom had linked to the old Phillipse Manor House, now the City Hall of Yonkers, and he, nothing loath, gave the story; but he felt forced to hurry its close, to tell his listeners that, "right here, off Yonkers, occurred in 1777 a fierce naval fight between two British frigates and a fleet of patriotic whaleboats that had tried to force a fire-ship against the British craft."
"How did it come out?" asked Jack.
"Well, the Americans were very nearly successful," said Uncle Tom;
"but the British tars were too wide-awake, and saved themselves from de-
“THE LONG, DARK ESCARPMENT OF THE PALISADES.”
At the lower end of these was Block House Point, the scene of Wayne’s famous Cow Chase, and André’s humorous poem.
struction after a sharp resistance. But see,” he continued, “here we are off Dobbs Ferry, one of the most important of the Revolutionary points hereabout.”

“Why?” asked Bert, as they looked toward the pretty village on the New York side, stretching up from the river to the ridge, embo...ed with splendid summer houses.

“At that little village of ‘Dobbs his ferry,’” said Uncle Tom, “the British gathered for the attack on Fort Washington, after the battle of White Plains; here they embarked to cross the Hudson for the reduction of Fort Lee and the pursuit of Washington; here, in the old Livingston manor house, Washington made his headquarters in 1781, when he met the Frenchman Rochambeau and planned the campaign of Yorktown; here the preliminaries of the evacuation of New York, which closed the war, were arranged by the American and British commanders; and here, on the eighth of May, 1783, a British fleet, which was anchored about where we are now sailing, fired England’s first salute to the Stars and Stripes.”

“Well, well! pretty good record for one village, is n’t it?” said Jack.

“Yes,” replied his uncle. “The Sons of the American Revolution have thought so, too, for they have put up a granite shaft, commemorating these events in front of the old manor house, and Mr. Depew claims it as the most important memorial spot of the American Revolution.”

Past noble mansions set in frames of glorious green, where stretches of hill and vale slope upward to the eastern ridge, the boat sped on, until suddenly Uncle Tom shot out a directing finger toward a gabled, ivy-covered cottage almost screened behind its fringe of trees.
“Sunnyside,” he announced.

“The home of Washington Irving,” they cried in chorus, as they recognized the name.

“And this is the Sleepy Hollow country, Uncle Tom?” said Christine.

“Yes,” Uncle Tom replied.

“Here walked Ichabod Crane and the fair Katrina; here rode the terrible headless horseman; here roamed cowboy and skinner in perpetual feud; here was the station of the fearless water-guard while worrying the British frigates; and here, at a later day, lived Washington Irving, the man who gave the master-touch to all this romantic region, and wrote in that ivy-draped cottage his great ‘Life of Washington.’”

“How interesting,” said Marian.

“Would n’t I like to have known him,” exclaimed Bert.

“I know him too well — or not enough,” grumbled Jack.

“We had ‘The Sketch Book’ at school last term.”

“Irvington, Tarrytown, Sleepy Hollow,” went on Uncle Tom; “so they string along in close succession on the Hudson’s eastern bank, linked to the name of Irving forever.”

“But is n’t this the André region, too?” asked Bert.

“Yes; here it may be said to begin,” his uncle answered. “Right over there, half-way on the road between Tarrytown and Sleepy Hollow, stands the obelisk, topped with a minute-man in bronze, which reads:

On this spot,
the 25th day of September, 1780, the spy
Major John André,
Adjudant-general of the British Army, was captured by John Paulding, David Williams and Isaac Van Wart, all natives of this County.
From here on to West Point the river is a continual reminder of that story of treachery, disaster, and death."

"Not disaster to our side, anyhow," exclaimed Jack. "We were all right."

"But André was n't—poor fellow," said Christine.

"No, that 's just it," laughed Jack. "André was n't all right, from the word go. He was a spy."

"Well, but not a real, mean, ugly, nasty spy. Was he, Uncle Tom?" persisted Christine.

Uncle Tom looked thoughtful.

"It was all a sad, bad business, children," he said at last—"Arnold's noble possibilities wrecked by ignoble desires and ungovernable jealousies; André's splendid career ruined by a false, mean act. Let us only remember now that Washington saw clearly through it all, recognized his duty and did it, in spite of everything. And, after all these years, looking back at that black and sorry time, the world says to-day, 'John André was a spy, and his punishment was just.' Let us not discuss it any more. Sympathy we can always show; but think what would have happened had that vile plot succeeded!"
Up the river so fraught with reminders of André's story they sailed on, Uncle Tom pointing out the spots of special note.

"Here, at Tarrytown, he was captured," he said; "here, off Croton, was anchored the British war-ship Vulture, which bore André on his fatal mission and carried Arnold away, disgraced forever; yonder, across the river, just above Haverstraw, you can see, on what is still called Treason Hill, the house of the Tory Smith, where Arnold met André and gave him the plans of the American works at West Point, and all the treacherous information desired; over the hills there, back of Nyack, lies Tappan, the old Dutch village—not much changed even now—to which André was taken. There he was tried, condemned, and executed. You can still see the house in which he was imprisoned and the house which Washington occupied, its windows looking off to the very hill-slope upon which André was hanged, courageous to the end, his last request being that his captors should bear witness to the world that he died like a brave man."

And again the girls sighed over the splendid young officer's terrible fate, while even the boys looked grave.

``Come, here is something much more pleasant," Uncle Tom exclaimed.
"Do you see that little lighthouse on the point jutting out from the western shore?"

They all saw it.

"That is Stony Point," said Uncle Tom.
“Hurrah for Mad Anthony Wayne!” cried Jack, glad to relieve his feelings. "Say, Uncle Tom, that was a great affair—Stony Point—was n't it?"

"Not so great, Jack," said Uncle Tom; "but certainly gallant. The Americans, you see, fortified that point of rock in 1777. The British took it from Lafayette in 1779 and strengthened it so much that they called it 'Little Gibraltar.' But one July day, that same year, along came, stealthily marching over the hills from West Point, Mad Anthony Wayne and a thousand men. At midnight, the little band crept close to the fort at Stony Point, and divided so as to attack it in front and rear. Wayne and his men were on the water side. The sentries heard them, the garrison was aroused. They sprang to resist the attack, but, straight on in the face of a galling fire, up the slope marched Wayne and his men. Wayne fell wounded, but was on his feet in an instant. 'Forward!' he cried, and over the ramparts leaped the Americans. Their comrades at the rear heard their shout of occupation, and charged on their side; then, left and right wings uniting, they drove the garrison to close quarters and surrender. It was a gallant affair, and it made the reputation of fearless General Wayne."

ALONG THE RIVER.

Anthony's Nose and the turn in the river, shown in the lower picture, is a few miles above Stony Point, where Anthony Wayne stormed the fort. Here in 1777 a great chain was stretched across the river to keep back British vessels.

"Well, it ought to," cried Jack. "Did we keep the fort?"

"We could n't, and did n't wish to, then," said Uncle Tom. "The captured stores and ordnance were carted off, the fort was dismantled, and the Americans withdrew with their prisoners. But, don't you see!—greater than the victorious rush was the confidence it inspired and the patriotism it re-awakened. Stony Point, like Trenton, was one of those spur-of-the-moment victories that have even wider results than the mere defeat of the foe. Inspiration is a great thing, boys and girls; it wins."

So they sailed up the storied river. They saw Verplanck's Point, on the opposite shore, where Washington, after Yorktown, bade his French allies good-by; and they looked at the bluff-built town of Peekskill, whence Putnam sent to the British camp that famous "spy letter," which said bluntly: "Edward Palmer, an officer in the enemy's service, was taken as a spy, lurking within our lines. He has been tried as a spy, condemned as a spy, and will be executed as a spy. P. S.—He is hanged."

They found, suddenly, the lost curve of the river, which had seemed to end here in a bay, and sailed through the southern river-gate into the heart of the Highlands; they ran past the slight remnants of two famous Revolutionary defenses—Fort Montgomery and Fort Clinton, captured after much manoeuvering by the British Clinton from the two American Clintons—the governor and the general; and so, at last, they came to West Point, the key to the Highlands, the one impregnable spot which the British could not take, —even through treachery,—the picturesque site of the Military Academy which has given to the republic, north and south, so many brave and famous soldiers.

"Oh, can't we see the cadets?" asked Marian.

The others looked desire, and seemed to echo Marian's request; but Uncle Tom was unyielding.

"Too modern," he said. "We are on a Revolutionary hunt, you know; there were no cadets in 1776."

Away from the government dock, on past Trophy Point, on under the shadow of Cro' Nest, which the girls knew best as the home of "that dear culprit Fay," of Drake's beautiful poem; on, under Storm King and Butter Hill and past Pollopol's Island— the northern gateway of the Highlands—they sailed, marveling at the beauty of it all, and at length came to the dock above which, on its terraced hillside, sits Newburgh—a city of special interest to our voyagers, because in it was still to be seen one of the most famous and best-preserved of all the headquarters of Washington.

Uncle Tom pointed it out to them from the river and described it carefully, from the cannon on the lawn to the celebrated room with seven doors and one window, even as it was in Washington's day.

They saw the stately Tower of Victory on the hill, and Uncle Tom told them why it was erected.

"In the east wall," he said, "beside the Angel of Peace, is set a bronze tablet that tells the story. It says—I've got the inscription among my memoranda somewhere—ah! here it is:

'This monument was erected under the authority of the Congress of the United States and of the State of New York, in commemoration of the disbandment, under proclamation of the Continental Congress of October 18, 1783, of the armies by whose patriotic and military virtue our national independence and sovereignty were established.'"

Uncle Tom recounted the things that had made famous the old Hasbrouck house, used as Washington’s headquarters, but declared that he thought the greatest and most momentous event in Washington’s life occurred there, "when he resisted temptation."

"What temptation?" queried Bert.

"To be King of America," replied Uncle Tom.

"I guess not. He was n't that kind," exclaimed Jack. "Who tempted him?"

"His own soldiers," Uncle Tom replied. "Wearied by the delays of Congress, uncertain as to the future, they thought that Washington’s seizing the power was the only way to settle things, and they were ready to aid him."
"Cæsar and Napoleon over again," remarked Bert.

"But George Washington was neither of these," said Uncle Tom.

"George Washington was the noblest kind of a patriot."

"’First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen,’" cried Jack.

"He was angry, indeed, at the bare thought," said Uncle Tom. "He turned on the proposer magnificently. ‘I am at a loss to conceive,’ he said, ‘what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address which to me seems big with the greatest mischief that can befall any country. . . . Let me conjure you, if you have any regard for your country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, as from yourself or any one else, a sentiment of the like nature!’"

"Great!" said Jack. "That settled it, I guess."

"Indeed it did," Uncle Tom replied; "and to me, boys and girls, that seems one of the noblest moments in the life of the great Washington."
And of course Uncle Tom’s auditors, being enthusiastic young republicans, agreed with him vociferously.

Past Fishkill, where Baron Steuben drilled the recruits into soldiers; past Kingston, with its old Senate House and its reminders of British invasion; past Clermont, the noble estate for which Fulton named his first steamboat, where lived the Livingstons—soldiers, statesmen, and patriots; past the long, splendid ridge of the Catskills, fringing the western sky, they sailed; and finally, at sunset, made fast to the pier at Albany, tired but enthusiastic at the close of what they all claimed to be one of the most delightful of all their delightful trips.

“What lots and lots we’ve seen!” they said.

“Such a sail!” cried Roger.
"THE SPLENDID RIDGE OF THE CATSKILLS,"
As seen from the river above Kingston, which the British devastated in 1777.
"Such a river," exclaimed Marian.
"Such a panorama," said Bert.
"Such a picnic," declared Jack.
"Such an Uncle Tom," said Christine.

And thereupon all the five gave a characteristic demonstration of approval, as they gathered up their traps; and the next moment they were threading the streets of ancient Albany.

Of course they enjoyed the famous old city. It is full of interesting spots as it sits upon its hill-tops, looking off toward the western Helderbergs and the Berkshires across the great river.

They heard many stories of the old Dutch days, and especially of the boy baron—the last of the patroons of Rensselaerswyck. Uncle Tom told them, too, that the old town was one of the chief depots of supply in the Revolution and was always "going to be taken" by the British, but never was. The travelers, however, had eyes but for one thing—the splendid, stately new State capitol whose white walls and towers rise above everything else.
CHAPTER IX
PROMENADING WITH BURGOYNE

At the Springs — Burgoyne's Promenade — Oriskany and Bennington — Schuyler and Gates — The "Lone Tree" of Walloomsac — The Bennington Monument — Across Country to Schuylerville — Freeman's Farms and Bemis Heights — The Saratoga Monument — The Vacant Niche — The Surrender Spot.

The morning concert in the great hotel was over; the well-dressed throng wandered away on rest or pleasure bent; Roger and Jack, who had tested and tasted of each and every spring in the whole gorgeous Spa, were quite in condition to remain quiescent for a space, and Uncle Tom, gathering the five chairs about him on the broad and shaded piazza, turned the attention of his youthful group of comrades to the business in hand — battle-fields.

"There's an odd thing about this fight we are now to consider, boys and girls," he said.

"Which is—?" queried Bert.

"That it was not fought here at Saratoga, nor by the general who has all the credit of the affair," Uncle Tom replied.

"Sir," said Jack senatorially, "you speak in riddles."

"Yes, what do you mean?" cried Marian.  "It's called the battle of Saratoga."

"But that battle-ground is fully a dozen miles away," Uncle Tom replied; "and Schuyler, who planned the campaign, was the real victor of the fight."

"But why is it called the battle of Saratoga?" asked Roger.

"And why is Gates called the victor of Saratoga?" queried Bert.

"Because both are correct," his uncle replied.

"But you just said it was n't so," said Marian.  "Uncle Tom, what is the matter with you?"
"Too bad, too bad," said Jack. "He's taken one spring too many."

"Do give us the facts, Uncle Tom," said Bert.

"The facts are these," Uncle Tom remarked, smiling at their perplexity. "Burgoyne, a brave soldier and a gallant gentleman, though with an over-supply of confidence and bluster, was placed in command of a picked English army and sent south from Canada to clear the Hudson Valley of rebels and join with Clinton in New York."

"Nice little contract laid out for him," remarked Roger.

"He considered himself equal to it," said Uncle Tom. "He had already asserted that with ten thousand men he could promenade through America. The British government took him at his word, gave him a fine army of ten thousand men, and told him to promenade."

"And that's what we're up here for, is it—to promenade with him?" remarked Jack. "All right; fall in, boys! mark time—for'ud—hup! Where do we promenade first, Uncle Tom?"

"Easy walking at first, Jack," his uncle replied. "From Quebec to Fort Edward, Burgoyne found it really a promenade. Fort and post fell before him; resistance was faint, and he was so confident of victory that he hurried off a special messenger to King George, telling the king that everything was going just as he wished it."

"'Better not holler until you're out of the woods.'" said Roger.

"That's so, Roger; it's a waste of breath; and so Burgoyne found it," Uncle Tom replied. “For, while he was enjoying his promenade, and his Tories and Indians were thinking of the pickings they were to have when the army got into the rich Hudson Valley, a determined and valiant man—a soldier and a general indeed—was working against desperate odds to stop the triumphal career of Burgoyne.”

“Schuyler?”

“Yes. That able and masterly soldier had been working like a beaver to head off Burgoyne. Against almost insurmountable obstacles, in spite of jealousy, misrepresentation, secret wire-pulling, and Congressional stupidity, Schuyler had labored on, upheld by his own sense of duty and Washington’s support. Soon the fruits of his work began to show. Two side-issues attempted by Burgoyne were brought to naught by the uprising of the people, and crippled Burgoyne beyond repair.”

“What were they, Uncle Tom?” asked Bert.

“One was the devastation of the beautiful Mohawk Valley; the other, the seizure of supplies and horses at Bennington, across the Vermont line. Both were signal failures,” Uncle Tom remarked. “At Oriskany, just beyond the present city of Utica, St. Leger and his Tories and Indians were checked and turned back by the valiant old General Herkimer after one of the bloodiest engagements of the war. At Bennington, on the slopes of the Green Mountains, brave General Stark cut to pieces the invading Hessians of Baum.”

“Molly Stark’s husband, was n’t he?” cried Marian.

“Who’s Molly Stark?” said Jack.

“I’ll tell you at Bennington,” replied Uncle Tom. “Just now we’re interested in Burgoyne. Checked at Oriskany, overwhelmed at Bennington, rudely awakened by a few other experiences of the same sort, Burgoyne saw that his promenade was not to be such a success, after all.”

“Not a real sprinting-match for the championship, eh?” said Jack.

“Well, the sprinting-match was there,” Uncle Tom replied, “but the championship was in dispute. Burgoyne began to feel alarm. Reinforcements were not forthcoming, either from Sir Guy Carleton at Quebec, or from Sir Henry Clinton at New York. Driven to extremities, surrounded by an aroused and gathering people, disappointed in his hope of succor from the Tories of the invaded section, Burgoyne's only course was to force his way through to the lower Hudson and unite with Clinton. 'This army must not retreat,' was his order, as he crossed the Hudson on his bridge of boats above Schuylerville, a dozen miles to the east of us, and marshaled his forces for battle."

"Here?" asked Roger.

"No; over by the Hudson," replied Uncle Tom. "We'll go over the ground to-morrow or next day. Burgoyne had got himself into a bad box. The Americans were as jubilant as the British were despondent. Suddenly, a serious thing happened. On the very eve of the victory which he had been organizing so splendidly, Schuyler was deprived of his command."

"Why, how mean!" cried Marian.

"What for?" asked Bert.

"Because Gates was a place-hunter, a wire-puller, a worker for himself and no one else," Uncle Tom replied. "He was very jealous of Schuyler, of whom Washington entertained a high opinion, and who had replaced Gates in the northern command. So he just haunted Congress, working secretly for Schuyler's position. His influence was strong enough to compass his ends, and Schuyler was set aside in favor of this intriguer and politician, who never showed ability or fitness for anything save setting sly traps for successful rivals."

"A little hard on him, are n't you, Uncle Tom?" asked Bert.

"No, I think not," Uncle Tom replied. "From the day he took the command at Boston in Massachusetts, to the day he ruined himself at Camden in South Carolina, the career of Horatio Gates was that of a self-seeker. He played Washington false at the crossing of the Delaware, and was the whole background of the infamous plot to 'down' that greatest patriot, which is known as the 'Conway Cabal.' He aroused in Benedict Arnold the spirit of discontent that drove that unbalanced partizan to treason. He supplanted Schuyler by persistent and peculiar methods, robbed him of his opportunity and his fame, and would joyfully have degraded him had not the gallant Schuyler, unlike the hot-headed Arnold, been above resentment. When relieved of his command, Schuyler only said, 'The country before everything,' and set about helping Gates all he could by his influence and position in the region about Saratoga. For he lived just beyond those hills, toward the Hudson, you know."

"Why did n't he kick?" cried Jack indignantly. "I would."

"No, you would not, Master Jack," his uncle replied, "not when you
When the Indians came over the border with Burgoyne to ravage the valley of the Hudson, it was on this raiding march that Jane McCrea was murdered, and that such incidents as this occurred; for there were Indians on both sides.

THE ARROWS OF THE ALLIES.
saw how much depended on union of action and purity of purpose. Schuyler saw this, and heaped upon his rival's head those coals of fire that had set the patriotism of these hills ablaze."

"Good for him!" cried Jack.

"Was n't he fine?" said Christine.

"Just as he had things right where he wanted them, too," said Roger.

"Yes, folks do say," Uncle Tom remarked, "that Stark's victory at Bennington decided the campaign, and that Burgoyne was really defeated then. This is hardly the fact, for the nail had to be clinched after it was driven; yet it is certain that the defeat of Baum and his Hessians did pave the way for Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga."

With Bennington in view as a starting-point, they boarded the train the next day, and running east to Hoosick Falls, took the trolley through that pleasant hill-town, vocal with its tumbling waters and the whir of its busy industries, and whizzed out to the hill at Walloomsac, where the battle was fought.

"What, here?" cried Bert. "Why, I thought it was fought at Bennington."

"No, sir; right up along that ridge yonder before you cross the York State line," said a communicative villager who stood beside them on the piazza of the village hotel. "Of course, they marched down from Bennington, and it was mostly Bennington folks who did the fighting, so that lets 'em out; but when they tell you the battle of Bennington was fought in Vermont, you tell 'em it was the battle of Walloomsac in York State."

"Another idol shattered," said Bert, who did like to deal in facts.

"That's all right," Uncle Tom remarked, as they walked across the fields toward the "lone pine" that marks the battle-line on the ridge; "it's another case of local difference, you see. But, for all practical and historical purposes, it was the battle of Bennington. In that town it was arranged; there the militia rendezvoused; from there they marched to the field; and it was really a running fight from the grist-mill by the falls to the bridge near Bennington. It was a spirited action, too."

They climbed the ridge of Battle Hill, once cut by Baum’s hasty intrenchments and marked now by the “lone tree of Walloomsac”; then, descending, they passed the supposed burial-place of that brave but defeated Hessian, and took the train for Bennington. At North Bennington, where Stark spent the night before the fight, and through which runs the creek where the battle began, they changed cars, and were soon at the beautiful city of the hills, nestled in the wide green valley of the Walloomsac. They drove to the pleasant hotel on Monument Avenue, while ever before them, at the foot of the verdant cone of Mount Anthony, rose the big blue shaft of the battle monument, the second tallest in the land.

“I had no idea it was such a big thing,” said Jack, while even Roger felt that Bunker Hill was overtopped.

Set on the top of a green knoll over seven hundred feet above the sea, the obelisk of blue dolomite springs three hundred feet in air, from the very spot where, in Revolutionary days, stood the Continental store-house which was Burgoyne’s objective point in the Bennington raid. Four hundred iron steps lead to the outlook chamber at the top.

Up these they groped their way, read the inscriptions, and marveled at the unrivaled view. Descending, they stood beneath the great captured camp-kettle of Burgoyne, suspended above their heads as a relic of Saratoga’s fight; and then, crossing the lawn, read upon a simple marble slab, cracked and stained with long exposure, this:

On this site stood the Continental store-house, the rendezvous of the Green Mountain Boys who fought the glorious battle of Bennington, the 16th of August, 1777. This battle turned the scale of Victory in favour of American Independence. To the memory of those patriots this humble monument is erected by one who had a father and nine uncles in the battle, one of whom was killed.
"The old and the new," said Christine, looking from the simple, time-stained slab to the tall and towering obelisk; "and both tell the story, too, don't they?"

"Great boy, that Stark, was n't he?" exclaimed Jack as, a little later, walking down Monument Avenue, they stood before the bronze catamount, high on its pedestal of Vermont marble, and erected in 1897 to mark the site of the Catamount Tavern, which played a remarkable part in the history of Vermont. There Ethan Allen had planned the attack on Ticonderoga; there Stark had decided upon and directed the fight above the Walloomsac; there the Green Mountain boys and the men of New Hampshire came hurrying to the rendezvous, determined to "hobble the Hessians."

"You 're right, Jack," said Uncle Tom; "John Stark was a valiant fighter. He knew how to do his duty. He made his mark at Bunker Hill. He led the van at Trenton. He fought in the 'college rush' at Princeton; and here he disobeyed the orders of Congress by staying at Bennington to fight Baum and his Hessians. 'There they are, boys!' he cried, waving his sword toward the raiding Germans. "We 'll get 'em, or to-night Molly Stark 'll be a widow!' Then he 'pitched in' and won. For this he received promotion and thanks from the very Congress whose words of censure for his disobedience of orders had hardly had time to cool."

"It all depends, does n't it?" said Jack. "How would it do to try on that sort of tactics at school, I wonder?"
“Not until you know more than your teachers, Jack,” was Uncle Tom’s comment. “Stark did.”

They spent the night in beautiful Bennington so that the boys and girls could get into their trip the trolley-ride up the mountain, and enjoy from the hotel piazza that superb early-morning view of the broad and picturesque Walloomsac Valley and the forest-crested ramparts of the Green Mountain heights.

Then they rode back to Johnsonville on the main line, took a branch road to pleasant Greenwich, and drove across country to Schuylerville, where, on the height above the town, rises another mighty obelisk of blue granite, commemorating the field of what has been judged by historians to be one of the decisive battles of the world—Saratoga.

Standing beside that splendid shaft reared by the exertions of patriotic citizens and the aid of Congress, Uncle Tom briefly sketched the story of the victory it commemorates.

He told his boys and girls of Schuyler’s untiring efforts and Burgoyne’s growing perplexities, of the British advance across these very hills and by the river-road, while Gates, following Schuyler’s lines, marched his constantly growing army of minutemen and militia from the Mohawk to the Hudson, and threw up breastworks and rude fortifications stretching from the river to the heights. He told them that the region all about Schuylerville was known at that time as Saratoga, though now divided up into various post-offices and settlements, while the little town of Schuylerville, lying about the mouth of Fish Creek, was really known for years as Old Saratoga. “Hence it is really the battle of Saratoga, you see.”

“Perplexed and dispirited by the defeats at Oriskany and Bennington,” said Uncle Tom, “Burgoyne moved down the river, while an American colonel with a strong spy-glass, perched in the top of a tree on a hill across the river, watched all the preparations for the start, and hurried across to re-

GENERAL DANIEL MORGAN.
Who commanded the riflemen at Saratoga. From a portrait in the possession of Mrs. V. N. Taylor, of Washington, D. C. Reproduced, by permission, from “Battles of Saratoga, 1777.”
port the fact to Gates in his camp at Stillwater. The Americans prepared to meet the enemy, and soon battle was joined. There were two engagements — the first at Freeman’s Farms, about ten miles southwest of us, across the hills, the other three weeks later, at Bemis Heights, near to the river.”

“I know the dates,” said Bert; “September 19 and October 7, 1777.”

Uncle Tom nodded. “That’s right. One battle was the complement of the other. Saratoga was, in fact, a sort of bivalve battle. One shell was Freeman’s Farms on September 19; the other shell was Bemis Heights on October 7.”

“And Burgoyne the oyster shut in between,” said Roger.

“Exactly,” Uncle Tom assented. “The shells closed on him relentlessly and locked him fast; then Arnold’s sword and Morgan’s rifle-barrel pried the bivalve open.”

“And Gates ate the oyster,” said Jack.

“Just so. It was all in logical order,” Uncle Tom declared. “The country was roused. Burgoyne was desperate. He had to fight, and he fought. He had veteran troops; he had brave and competent generals, both English and Hessian: Frazer and Reidesel, Phillips and Breyman.”

“But Gates had their equals, didn’t he?” said Bert.

“That he had,” Uncle Tom replied; “Arnold and Morgan, Kosciusko, Dearborn, Poor, and Learned — valiant fighters all. And how they did fight! While Gates stayed in his tent, hesitating, Arnold led the battle at Freeman’s Farms, hurling back the British onset, and Morgan’s shrill whistle directed his riflemen in their impetuous rush. Phillips and Arnold, destined to fight on the same side later — the more’s the pity! — fought up and down the ravine I will show you, while the little stream that trickles through it ran red with blood.”

“Oh, dear!” shuddered the girls.
"Night alone closed the fight; but the British advance was checked. Had Gates seconded Arnold promptly and properly, the battle would have been a decisive victory. Instead, his jealousy swallowed up his justice; he slighted and censured Arnold, and finally deprived him of his command and gave him nothing to do or say."

"That was mighty mean," said Jack indignantly.

"Yes; Arnold was furious, and when the chance came he snapped his fingers at Gates's orders," said Uncle Tom. "That dilatory leader—really a case of a man having greatness thrust upon him—stayed in his encampment while, of their own accord, the plans that Schuyler had so skilfully laid combined for the closing struggle. It came at last—off there, toward the river, just beyond Freeman's Farms, on a ridge called Bemis Heights. Burgoyne led out his troops. 'Order out Morgan,' said Gates, and Morgan opposed the British advance. The battle raged hotly. Morgan swept down upon Frazer, and the brave Englishman fell on the field. The Hessians held their ground; victory hung in the balance. Then, with a rush—he could simply stand it no longer, you see—Arnold galloped from his tent, where he had been a restless spectator of the battle, and, in open defiance of Gates, regardless of the aide who came spurring after him to order his return, he was speedily in the thick of it all. His coming was an inspiration. The regiments rallied; charging after their impetuous leader, they stormed the Hessians, who turned in flight before the rush. Burgoyne tried in vain to rally his army; he was driven into his camp. Then Arnold, turning, charged against the Hessian camp on the hill, killed Breyman, the commander, and sent everything scattering before him. Then he fell wounded; and then came the night. Burgoyne retreated here to Schuylerville, and encamped on this very hill, down which, ten days later, the red-coats and Hessians marched to the flats by the river and surrendered to the American commander. It was the end of the ‘promenade’; it was the beginning of the Republic.”

“1777–1883,” read Bert, turning to the bronze plate set at the entrance into the tall granite obelisk:

“This monument was erected under the auspices of the Saratoga Monument Association, to commemorate the surrender of General Burgoyne to General Gates, on the 17th of October, 1777.”

“Good enough!” cried Jack, smiting the captured British 24-pounder before the portal a sounding smack. “Show us the very spot, Uncle Tom.”

“All in good time; let’s look at this first,” his uncle replied.

They entered the neatly kept memorial-room in the base; they climbed the stairs and studied all the fine and striking bas-reliefs in bronze that picture the great event; they admired the heroic bronze statues of the great leaders of the battle, each in a niche on the outer faces of the obelisk.

There stood Schuyler, organizer of victory; there Gates, who plucked the fruits of that organization; there Morgan, hero of Northern and Southern fields; and there—

“Why, hullo!” cried Jack, “this one is vacant. Who goes in here?”

They had come to the southern side of the monument expectantly, and now stood gazing up perplexedly at the empty niche that yawned before them.
“Don’t you know who should have gone there, boys and girls?” said Uncle Tom. “Who was the real hero of the battle? Who led the charge and really won both fights? Who?”

“And yet his niche stands vacant. Why?” asked Uncle Tom.

“Because he was a traitor!” said Bert.

“Oh, how dreadful that is!” said Christine.

“T is kind of rough, isn’t it?” was Roger’s comment. But Jack said stoutly, “No; it serves him right.”

“And how does it serve us?” demanded his uncle. “Is it not a lesson and a reminder as well? That niche would have been filled with Arnold’s statue had he not proved a traitor to his country. What he won he lost. To me that empty niche is the most eloquent of all the reminders of this famous field of strife and history.”

Impressed, all of them, by this sermon in stone, they descended the hill and walked about the historic town of Schuylerville, known to far too few Americans. Above them towered the monument; below them flowed the Hudson, for whose possession all this blood had been shed; all about them stretched green fields and crested heights, ever speaking of a great struggle and a wonderful victory.

They saw the home of General Schuyler on the banks of the rushing, tumbling Fish Creek; they saw the fine old Marshall house, in which Madame Reidesel and her three little girls passed that dreadful day of battle, and in which the brave General Frazer died; they stood on the field of surrender, now no field at all, but a busy business street, and read the bronze tablet set in the dead wall of a brick block:

"Near this spot, October 16, 1777, American and British officers met and consummated articles of capitulation of General Burgoyne to General Gates. And on this ground the British army laid down their arms, thus securing American Independence."

Next day they took carriages and drove slowly over the two battle-fields, whose important spots are marked by granite tablets carefully inscribed—"a good deal like Concord and Lexington," so Roger declared.

Along the old highway, by wide farms, far-reaching valleys, and forest-covered ridges, they drove—an intensely interesting ride, that led them through Quaker Spring and Freeman's Farms and Bemis Heights, not so rapidly but that they had time to see all the tablets and read all the inscriptions.

Here General Frazer fell; here lay the great ravine where Acland was wounded, and the rivulet ran blood-red; here was the old battle well at Freeman's Farms, for which so desperate a fight was waged; here stood old Fort Neilson—a rude breastwork of logs and earth; here were Gates's headquarters, here Bemis's tavern, here Kosciusko's water-battery. A tablet marked the British line of battle and the American encampment; a tablet stood where Arnold was wounded at the heroic assault of Breyman's camp; a tablet showed where Morgan assailed Frazer, and another stood where fell Lieutenant Hardin of Morgan's riflemen, storming Balcarras's redoubt.

And so, all along that historic road, the granite tablets dotted hill and plain—an object-lesson in American valor and British pluck, displayed in a field that speaks forever of patriotism, courage, the desperation of defeat, the jubilation of victory, combined in one of the world's most notable conflicts—the double battle of Saratoga.
Then, full of what they had seen, they drove on to Stillwater, where they dismissed their Schuylerville teams and "trolleyed" it to Mechanicville, and so by rail to Saratoga again.

But as next day they went southward and homeward, Jack said: "It's no use, Uncle Tom; we're in for it, and so are you. If we've seen the Northern battle-fields, we must see the Southern ones. Must n't we, folkses?"

And all the "folkses" replied with an enthusiastic and vociferous "Yes."

"Ask father," said Jack.

Uncle Tom yielded—willingly; and so did "father" and all the other powers.

As a result, maps were carefully studied, guide-books closely examined; and at the proper time the Southern campaign was duly and delightfully opened by Uncle Tom and his battle-field brigade.
“SENT SOUTH TO 'PACIFY' THE CAROLINAS.”

The British fleet lay off the entrance to the Savannah River, December the twenty-third, 1778.
CHAPTER X

FROM THE SEA TO THE SAND-HILLS

By Sea to Savannah — Where the British Landed — The Siege of Savannah — A City of Monuments — Fascinating Charleston — The Defense of Fort Moultrie — The Battle of Eutaw Springs.

The young folks gathered about Uncle Tom, in the very nose of the bow, as the stanch steamer sailed cautiously up the river. Coming south by sea, they had a most invigorating voyage. Even Hatteras seemed to have calmed down for their especial benefit, and the hazy land-line of the Carolina coast smiled at them in a balmy welcome.

It had been a delightful trip—quite different, Uncle Tom declared, from that of the British fleet, which, sailing from Sandy Hook to the attack of Savannah and the subjugation of the southern colonies, was very nearly a whole month in making the voyage—from November 27 to December 23, 1778.

"It was after Saratoga, then?" said Roger.

"Oh, yes," Uncle Tom replied; "over a year later. The British government determined upon the conquest of the southern colonies, which, except for the unsuccessful attack on Fort Moultrie in Charleston harbor, early in the war, had practically been unmolested. So this expedition of which I speak was sent south by water to overawe and 'pacify' the Carolinas. It is the trail of the British sword that we are now following."

They rounded the Martin's Industry lightship, far out, off the bar; they sailed under the lee of the striped tower of Tybee Light, and soon were threading the narrow channel of the yellow Savannah River, where the new jetties mark the tortuous passage.

"When you get home again," said Uncle Tom, sweeping his hand toward the long, low, sandy island on the left, "you must look up Whittier's Tybee poem. That is Tybee, you know."
"Oh, I remember that," said Christine. "Does n't it begin:

'The tent-lights glimmer on the land,
The ship-lights on the sea;
The night winds smooth with drifting sand
Our track on lone Tybee.'"

"That's it," Uncle Tom answered. "It comes to me again and again as we coast these low, sandy shores. But things have changed greatly since Whittier wrote that poem. The tent-lights on Tybee are now the 'electrics' of the string of seaside hotels, and the 'track on lone Tybee' to-day is the railway track over which run the comfortable cars that carry visitors from Savannah to the splendid, floor-like, five-mile beach of Tybee, for a day's or a week's outing."

"So here's where the British came sailing along, is it?" said Jack. "There were n't any light-houses or jetties then, I suppose. I hope they ran aground."

"No, they did n't, Jack," Uncle Tom replied. "They were wise enough not to attempt this dangerous channel. The fleet lay off the entrance to the river; the British troops were landed over there on Tybee Island. They advanced on the city, were joined by reinforcements from Florida, captured Savannah, overran Georgia, and advanced on Charleston. Then, fearful of an American rising, they fell back to Savannah, and did nothing for several months except make themselves particularly disagreeable to the conquered patriots."

"They had a fondness for that, it seems to me," said Marian.

"Suddenly," continued Uncle Tom, "hope sprang up anew in the breasts of the dispirited Americans. In September, 1779, D'Estaing, with a splendid French fleet, King Louis's first open assistance to the new United States of America, came sailing up from the West Indies, and anchored just where we have been sailing, off the mouth of the Savannah River. Meantime, our old friend Lincoln, of Dor-

THE FRIEND OF AMERICA. KING LOUIS XVI OF FRANCE.
(From an old print.)
“Ah, ha!” said Jack, growing interested; “now this begins to look like business.”

“Yes, it begins to,” was Uncle Tom’s reply, “but it proved a bad business. Do you see that bluff over there to the left, beyond the rice-fields?”

They all saw it—a green, tree-fringed ridge, rising out of the fen-like rice-lands.

“There the French and Americans joined forces and, marching along that very road, advanced to within three hundred yards of the British defenses. The British made a sortie, but were repulsed and driven within their lines. Then the allied armies bombarded the city for a few days, and at last determined to assault its defenses. It was well planned, but a Charleston militia officer, named Curry, deserted to the British and gave them the whole secret of the proposed attack, which therefore failed, and, indeed, ended in disaster. In that onset, called the battle of the Spring Hill redoubt, Pulaski and the brave Sergeant Jasper were killed. The French admiral feared for the safety of his fleet in case of an Atlantic gale, and, sailing hurriedly away, he left Lincoln and the Americans in the lurch, and the poor patriots of Georgia were in a worse plight than ever.”
"Dreadful!" exclaimed Marian.

"Fine lot of help, he was!" cried Jack.

"What did Lincoln do?" Bert asked.

"He retreated to Charleston. General Clinton came sailing down from New York with more British, and the trouble grew worse, as you will see when we get to Charleston," Uncle Tom replied.

So, with Uncle Tom's brief sketch of the siege of Savannah as a side-light, they sailed on up the narrow river, across whose far-reaching bar Oglethorpe had first sailed with his philanthropic plans of a great Protestant province; where the Wesleys had come, aflame with missionary ardor, and Whitefield, gentlest of religious enthusiasts; where the last outpost against Spanish arrogance had been established and maintained; where the first naval capture by the revolted colonists had been made in the American Revolution; and where first the flag of the Southern Confederacy had been raised in Georgia.

They threaded the narrow channel where the river wound through low and verdant marsh-lands, through humid rice-plantations, past the neat, white houses of the light-tenders and the dotted fretwork of the new jetties, past the cotton-lands, the martello tower and the forts; then the long line of cotton- and resin-docks came in sight, with tramp steamers labeled with outlandish North Sea names; and so at last they tied fast to the dock, and were speedily rattling up the city streets to the fine hotel in the region of parks and statues.

They were in Savannah. And the very first thing they came upon, as they sallied forth for a walk after dinner, was a spirited and dramatic statue directly in front of the hotel.

“What is it? Is n’t it fine?” cried Marian.

“Dat ’s de Jasper monument, miss,” said a small darky in reply.

“Jasper? Who was he?” asked Marian.

“I dunno, miss; I reckon he was a gemman what fit endu’in’ de wah,” the darky replied.

Bert, who meanwhile was at his usual occupation of deciphering inscriptions, now read aloud, with his eyes fixed on the pedestal of the beautiful monument:

“To the heroic memory of Sergeant William Jasper, who, though mortally wounded, rescued the colors of his regiment in the assault on the British lines about this city, October 9, 1779. A century has not dimmed the glory of the Irish-American soldier whose last tribute to civil liberty was his noble life. 1779-1879.”

“Sergeant Jasper?” said Christine. “Why, did n’t he have something to do at Fort Moultrie?”

“Oh, yes, I know,” said Roger; “saved the colors, did n’t he?”

“But that ’s what this monument says he did here in Savannah,” said Bert, still looking at the stirring figure.

“He did it at both places,” Uncle Tom explained.

“Why, he was a regular color-sergeant, was n’t he?” cried Jack.

“He was a brave and daring young fellow,” said Uncle Tom. “We shall run across him again in Charleston. He was identified with numerous Revolutionary happenings in this region. Two miles above here he, with a single companion, rescued a company of American prisoners from their guard of ten men and forced the ten to surrender. I believe they now call the place Jasper Spring.”

“Good for you, sir! You were a trump!” said Jack, doffing his cap to the spirited soldier in bronze, the gallant flag-bearer.

They walked along Bull street and its stretch of sandy parks until they came to the point where, in Monterey Square, a tall shaft of Italian marble, topped by a statue of Liberty, rose before them.

“The Pulaski monument,” said Uncle Tom.

And Marian, whose turn it was to be inscription-reader, gave the brief memorial lines:

“Pulaski the heroic Pole who fell mortally wounded fighting for American liberty at the siege of Savannah
9 October 1779.”

“He was the fellow from Poland, eh?” Jack remarked.

“Yes,” Uncle Tom replied, “and a valuable supporter of the American cause.”

“That’s so,” said Bert; “we’ve come across him before — at Brandywine, was n’t it? and Valley Forge?”

“Yes, he was at both places,” said Uncle Tom. “He joined the army as a volunteer, but was soon made a brigadier-general. He was a dashing cavalry leader, and organized and led a corps called ‘Pulaski’s Legion.’”

“He was n’t the ‘Freedom-shrieked’ man, was he?” queried Jack.

“Oh, Jack!” cried Christine, “what a way to put it! That was Kosciusko, in Campbell’s poem, was n’t it, Uncle Tom:

‘Hope for a season bade the world farewell,
And Freedom shriek’d as Kosciusko fell!’”

“Yes; don’t you remember, we caught a glimpse of his monument on the parapet of old Fort Clinton at West Point?” Uncle Tom replied.

“That’s so,” Jack said, nodding his recollection. “But say, why were those Polish boys so ready to chip in and help us?”

“Because of two women and a man,” Uncle Tom replied.

“Another of Uncle Tom’s history puzzles. What do you mean?” asked Marian.

“Wait a minute,” said Bert; and at once both he and Christine put on their thinking-caps.
“It’s something to do with the dismemberment of Poland, is n’t it, Uncle Tom?” Bert said.

“Yes,” his uncle replied. “For generations, you see, Poland was the small boy of Europe. Now one and now another of the big-boy nations around would ‘pick on him,’ as you say, and the land was in a constant struggle against outside and inside foes. At last, just before our American Revolution, the Empress Catherine of Russia, the Empress Maria Theresa of Austria—”

“Two women,” said Jack, nodding—

“—and Frederick the Great, king of Prussia—”

“And a man,” put in Marian—

“—joined together to divide Poland among themselves.”

“There’s your dismemberment of Poland,” remarked Bert.

“The patriots sprang to arms, among them Casimir Pulaski and Thaddeus Kosciusko,” Uncle Tom went on. “Defeated in the struggle,—for the great ‘combine’ was too much for them,—with others of their race they fled from their native land to America, and fought for our liberty more successfully than for their own.”

As they talked thus of Polish heroes, the tourists walked within the semitropical borders of Forsythe Park, with its fountains, its sphinxes, and its palms, and, turning at the Confederate monument, retraced their steps toward the river and the business section of the town.

And there in the heart of the city, in Johnson Square, they came upon another Revolutionary reminder—the old-fashioned, square-cut monument to the “second soldier of the Revolution,” so Uncle Tom declared. It said:

“Major-General Nathanael Greene. Born in Rhode Island, 1742. Died in Georgia, 1786. Soldier, patriot, the friend of Washington. This shaft has been reared by the people of Savannah in honor of his great services to the American Revolution.”

Unquestionably," Uncle Tom replied. "Nathanael Greene was a great man. Self-taught and self-made, this Quaker boy, this blacksmith's apprentice, at fourteen taught himself geometry, and before he was of age had become a careful student of military affairs. From Bunker Hill to Yorktown he was in the thick of the fight. Washington admired and trusted him; he rose to high command in the patriot army, and it was his head and hand that saved the South after the signal failure of the bombastic Gates. By his good work at Guilford Court House and Eutaw Springs he rendered Yorktown possible and made American independence a fact."

"That's a good deal to say for a man," said Bert, studying the stalwart bas-relief in Continental uniform.

"Fine-looking man, eh?" remarked Jack, joining his cousin.

"A manly man in every way," Uncle Tom declared. "Brown's statue of him in the Capitol at Washington is a fine-looking figure."

"Why did they put up a statue to him here?" asked Marian. "Did he have anything to do with the siege of Savannah?"

"He saved it from a second siege, or rather, by his skill, he scared away its British possessors," Uncle Tom replied. "More than that, as I have said, he saved the South, almost lost through the incompetency of Gates. That is why the Southern people admired and appreciated this Northern soldier. They gave him, after the war, a large estate near this town of Savannah; when he died, in 1786, he was buried here, a few squares from where we stand, in the quaint old Broad-street cemetery; and in 1829 this monument was erected in his honor. I admire Nathanael Greene."

"And so do we," said Jack, saluting the bronze effigy on the tablet.

"We shall meet him frequently," Uncle Tom assured them, "as we fight our way across the Carolinas to Yorktown."

They found much to admire in Savannah. Who would not? It is a fine old Southern city, so mingling old and new that, as Uncle Tom declared, its very street pavements marked its three stages of development — the sand age, the shell age, and the asphalt age.

The young folks did not know which to admire most, the climate or the curiosities. They marveled at the magnolias, the palmettos, and the live-oaks; they were full of questions at the Hermitage, last vestige of an old-time slave plantation; they enjoyed their drives to Thunderbolt and Beaulieu; they wheeled to Jasper Spring, and over the broad shell-road to sandy and silent Bonaventure, hung with its soft, gray moss; they traced out all the historic spots from Yamacraw Bluff, where Oglethorpe landed ("Dat's whar de cullud folks live now," their negro driver told them), to the typical Savannah mansion on Bull street in which General Sherman had his headquarters after his famous "march to the sea"; they stood in and about the dingy Central Railroad station at Broad street, held there by the information that on that very spot had stood the Spring Hill redoubt, where the gallant Pulaski received his death-wound, and where brave Sergeant Jasper fell in the very act of forcing the flag within the British lines. It was all history; it was all interesting.

And then, after two delightful days in Savannah, they took the noon train for Charleston, that city by the sea which has played so prominent and picturesque a part in two American wars.

The railway ride they decided to be, as Bert declared it, "interesting even in its monotony." It was a new experience to these Northern young people, albeit they were traveled folk. Past hovel and cabin and plantation home; over muddy rivers and yet muddier stretches of swamp, lit up now by the crimson gleam of the cardinal-flower, now by the scarlet flash of the redbird’s wing; through forests of pine, straight as the masts they were to make; over flat savannas, green with their growing crops; past slouching negroes riding their bullocks to the field; past piccaninnies playing in the open doorways of ramshackle cabins, while the mothers fished patiently in the run below; past tall chimneys, white with the crushed dust of the phosphate rock that sweetens the overworked farm-lands of the North,—still on they rode, catching here and there a name on milestone or railway sign-board that gave Uncle Tom a chance to bring forth certain Revolutionary data of the fruitless defense of Charleston against the second British invasion.

And then, just at supper-time, they left their car and rode to their hotel through the rambling streets of “dear, delightful, fascinating Charleston.” For so Marian dubbed the quaint old town after their four days’ rest therein.

Well! scarcely rest. They were continually on the go. How much they saw! How deeply they enjoyed it all! Under the guidance of Uncle Tom’s tirelessly courteous friend the journalist, a Charleston boy born and bred, they traversed the town from the splendid Battery, with its mansions and monuments, to old St. Michael's Church and the bewildering trees and flowers of Magnolia Garden.

Of course they went to Fort Moultrie. They could not get inside, greatly to their disappointment, owing to the new law, the wisdom of which Jack was inclined to dispute, as he stood by Osceola's grave and, across the grassy rampart above the sally-port, "had it out" with the sympathetic but immovable sergeant who seemed to constitute the entire garrison of this famous old fort on Sullivan's Island.

When, however, the young folks learned that there was, about the present fort, nothing at all of the Revolutionary Moultrie, and the palmetto logs that gave their name to the plucky little Palmetto State, they were more reconciled to their exclusion, which Roger called "the second repulse at Fort Moultrie."

"But what about the first repulse, Uncle Tom?" queried Bert.

They were promenading the splendid floor-like beach of Sullivan's Island. Above them towered the gray walls of the fort; behind them lay the summer village of Moultrieville and the great derricks of the government works; across the water, in the center of the splendid harbor, rose the dismantled walls of Fort Sumter, forever famous in the history of the world. All about them stretched wave and shore eloquent of American valor in two bitter wars. It was a spot to commemorate, a spot to glorify.

So the boys and girls fell to picking up sea-shells as mementos, in what Jack decided to be the exact range of the bombarding fire between Sumter and Moultrie on that historic April day of 'sixty-one.

And Roger echoed Bert's query.

"Fort Moultrie, boys," answered Uncle Tom, "was the Bunker Hill of the South. To its building and defense came the minute-men of the Carolinas; but time gave them that opportunity for discipline which the New England men lacked; and when, in June, 1776, a British fleet dropped anchor down the harbor, Moultrie and his men were ready to receive them. Where the stone fort stands they had partially completed a large fortification of palmetto logs and sand, calculated to shelter a force of a thousand men, but really defended by about four hundred men, and mounting thirty-one guns.

"The attack came on June 28. Twelve ships, large and small, made up the British squadron, from which Clinton with three thousand men was to land, protected by the guns of the fleet, and strike for the approaches to the city, defended by some three thousand men under command of General Charles Lee."

"The fellow that Washington pitched into at Monmouth?" asked Roger.

"The same," said Uncle Tom.

"Lee had advised giving up the palmetto fort," he continued; "he declared it to be a slaughter-pen. But Moultrie was there to hold it; and hold it he did.

"The British ships dropped within range and began a hot bombardment. 'Keep cool and do mischief!' came the order to Moultrie from anxious Governor Rutledge in Charleston."

"That's the talk!" said Jack; "and he did, did n't he?"

"He did, indeed," Uncle Tom replied. "All day the fight was on. Again and again Clinton attempted to land his storming-party, but had to give it up. Every shot from the fort told against the bombarding ships, while the keen-eyed Carolina riflemen swept the decks of men whenever the tide so swung the vessels around as to give them targets for their aim.

"The spongy logs of palmetto received the shot from the fleet, but did not crack or splinter, and so held firm. Night came on. The palmetto fort still stopped the way; the blue-and-silver flag still waved in defiance where Jasper had planted it, though once it had been struck down. Then, with half his ships crippled or disabled, with many seamen and soldiers killed or wounded, the British admiral drew out of the fight. Mosquitos and sand-flies came as allies to the patriots; the British fleet sailed away to the north, and for four years the soil of Carolina was free from an invading foe."

"Three cheers for Moultrie! Hip, hip, hurrah!" cried Jack, swinging his hat so violently that forty fiddler-crabs scuttled away from beneath the log on which the boy's emphatic foot was planted, and the solitary sergeant in the fort peered over the sea-front to determine the cause of the outbreak.

They left that splendid stretch of sea-beach, over which had been flung, twice at least to the glory of America, the smoking hail of war, and took the steamer back to Charleston.

They had two more days of sauntering and sight-seeing in and about that fascinating old Southern city, with its battered statue of Pitt, the friend of America; with its tall gate-posts, reminders of its Huguenot founders; with its rose-gardens, crimson and yellow in the sunshine; with its verandaed mansions full of stately memories; with its old Exchange tinged with the tragedy of Hayne, patriot and martyr; with its gallery of Southern worthies lining the walls of the old City Hall; with its traditions, its legends, and its stirring stories of stirring days long past; with its earthquake scars still unhealed, and its buildings of to-day close beside those of yesterday and the day before; with its hospitable people, its pleasant homes, its odd, old-fashioned ways. Then, regret mingling with anticipation, they took the train for the interior, where Camden sits upon her sand-hills and the tales of British occupation outlast the equal tragedies of the waste of civil war in the old Palmetto State.

Uncle Tom was kept busy, as usual, punctuating the time-table with stories of the Revolutionary days, as, mile by mile, they sped across the rolling land that gradually lifts itself to the healthful and beautiful Carolina highlands.

At Pregnell’s, where a branch road led its iron trail off to the right, Uncle Tom told them that there, beyond the pine forests, lay a celebrated battle-field of the Revolution — Eutaw Springs.

“In many ways it was notable,” he said. “Indeed, it would have been a great and signal victory had not the conquering Americans yielded to a foe more insidious than British regulars.”

“Why, who?” cried Bert. “I didn’t know they had any one else against them.”

“A bad foe in this case, Bert,” said Uncle Tom — “Rum!”

Whereupon Jack quoted:

“‘Oh, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains.’”

Marian gave a nod of approval at once for the sentiment expressed and for Jack’s unusual correctness in quotation. But Christine said, “Why, that was dreadful; tell us about it, Uncle Tom.”

“It was toward the end of the long war,” said Uncle Tom. “The Carolina battles which we are to study had all been fought. Yorktown was not far distant. The British began to see the end of things. A certain portion of the ‘lobster-backs,’ hard fighters all, were seeking to make a camp up among the Santee Hills, when suddenly General Greene, with about twenty-five hundred Americans, pounced upon them yonder in the healthful region about Eutaw Springs."

"Was it healthy for the British, Uncle Tom?" asked Jack.

"It came mightily near being most unhealthy for them," Uncle Tom replied. "The forces were about evenly matched; the men on both sides were proved and veteran fighters. Greene had with him such trained helpers as Marion and Pickens and William Washington (whose house we saw on the Battery at Charleston, you know) and Light-horse Harry Lee."

"The 'first in war, first in peace' man?" asked Jack.

"No, his cousin and the father of Robert E. Lee of the Civil War," Uncle Tom explained.

"Who was this William Washington, Uncle Tom? Any relation to George?" queried Marian.

"Only a distant one," answered her uncle. "A Virginian cousin. He was a stout fighter, though. He made his mark at Brooklyn, and Trenton, and Princeton. He came to South Carolina with Lincoln and commanded a troop of cavalry in many battles and engagements."

"What is the story about his flag, Uncle Tom?" asked Christine.

"Ah, you've heard of the romance, have you?" Uncle Tom remarked. "It was this way. You see his troop was without a flag. He was calling on a young lady in her stately old plantation home near Charleston, one day, and mentioned his lack of colors. 'Why, that's a shame,' cried Jane Elliot, on whom he was calling. At once she pulled down one of her mother's fringed crimson silk curtains. 'I reckon that will do,' she said, and falling to at once with scissors and needle, she cut a big square from the curtain, bound the edges, and fitted it to a hickory staff. 'Here's your flag, Colonel,' she said.

"Washington was delighted. The crimson flag was his banner of victory in four big battles—Cowpens, Guilford, Hobkirk's Hill, and Eutaw Springs. It exists to-day, and is in charge of the Washington Light Infantry of Charleston—faded and worn, but a sacred relic."
But where does the romance come in?" said Marian.

"You should guess that without my telling," said Uncle Tom.

"'Jane, Jane, she never looked the same,'" hummed Jack.

"That 's it," laughed his uncle.

"The gallant Colonel came again and again, and 'I reckon,' as they say here, Jane did always look 'the same' to him, Master Jack. So, of course, he married her at the end of the war, and in that big old house that we saw on the Battery at Charleston, they lived happily ever after."

Jack whistled the Wedding March from "Lohengrin," but Bert, true to his habit of "sticking to the subject," said:

"But about Eutaw Springs, Uncle Tom?"

"Sure enough," said his uncle.

"Well, the two small armies met on the morning of the eighth of September, 1781. There was a fierce attack; the shock of meeting was harsh, but British and Americans alike held their ground; the Carolina troops fired round after round; then, as they parted, the reserves pushed in; the British lines fell back; the Americans dashed on them with a bayonet charge. The rush was resistless; the British line wavered, turned, and fled for dear life, straight through their own camp, with the victorious Americans hard at their heels."

"That sounds well," said Jack. "I do like to hear of a victory."

"But now comes the sad sequel," said Uncle Tom. "Within that captured camp was plunder; within that captured camp was rum! The Americans, thinking they had won the day, stopped to celebrate. The rum was too much for them. Had they pursued without stopping, they would have swept the field and bagged the enemy. As it was—"

"Well, let 's have the worst," said Bert. "As it was—?"

"They gave the British time to recover and form again," said Uncle Tom. "The red-coats intrenched themselves securely in and about a big brick-house in the field—"
“Just as at the Chew house at Germantown, I declare!” said Marian.
“They held the Americans at bay, and fought so fiercely that when night came,” Uncle Tom continued, “neither side was victor. Each claimed the battle; but each retreated from the field, and Eutaw Springs, which was in many ways a hero-fight, failed of its ends because of rum, as I assured you.”
“George! that was mighty mean,” grumbled Jack. “What was the rum there for? Did the British need it to keep their courage up?”
“I suppose so,” said Roger. “Was that the way of it, Uncle Tom?”
“Rum was deemed a necessity of war in those days,” Uncle Tom explained. “Every army carried a supply. It was more thought of than food or medical stores. We do things better nowadays, I’m glad to say.”
“I should hope so,” said Bert.
“Then it was a draw—this battle of Eutaw Springs?” asked Jack.
“It was more than that,” his uncle replied. “It dispirited the British, and they scurried away to join their comrades at Charleston, where, soon after, as to Greene over yonder in his hill camp, came the glorious news of Yorktown and its surrender.”

The train sped on through that land of Revolutionary memories, on through the river region (where the streams vein the Carolina sand “like a physiology chart,” Bert declared), then across the Congaree, and beside the Wateree, until the ground rose to the rolling, beautiful sand ridges, and they stepped off the cars at the modest little station in quaint old Camden, the site of two far different battles in the stirring days of old.
IN THE OLD DAYS.

Charleston "great folks" leaving for the sand-hills, when Camden was a health resort, one hundred years ago.
CHAPTER XI

AMONG THE CAROLINA HIGHLANDS

"Oh! this air — this air!" said Marian.

"Breathe it in," cried Jack; "we have n’t struck anything like this in all our trips and travels."

And breathe it in they did, all of them, in what Bert declared to be wholesale drafts.

"Not exactly Boston east wind, is it, Roger?" remarked Jack, as once again they inhaled the dry, piny, odorous air. And the Boston boy cheerfully confessed that the often bracing but sometimes marrow-piercing breezes of Massachusetts Bay did not always possess the balmy, soothing, lung-strengthening quality of the sand-hill ridges of Camden.

They stood upon the wide, breezy, sun-bathed piazza of the home-like inn at Camden. All about them stretched the historic battle-ground of Hobkirk’s Hill; a few miles beyond them, upon the Salisbury road, lay the battle-field of Camden; and across the cotton-fields and the green spaces between the woodlands they could see the broad oak-bordered streets, the ample vine-covered mansions, and other bits and touches of this thrice-removed and always interesting “metropolis” of the Carolina sand-hills.

“A hundred years ago,” Uncle Tom told them, tossing a pine-cone with unerring aim at one of the Revolutionary cannons that guard the entrance to Cedar Row, at the foot of the piazza steps, “Camden was almost as much of a resort as it is to-day. In fact, the British found this out, and thinking it a good, healthy spot for a military post, they located a camp here in the sad days of the British invasion following the capture of Savannah and Charleston. Here we shall find traces of Cornwallis, of Rawdon, and of Tarleton—three names that spoke terror to the up-country folk of those troubled times; but here, too, can we find reminders of Greene and Marion, of De Kalb and Morgan and Light-horse Harry Lee, and others whose names lent strength and courage to the badgered patriots. Through all the years of British occupation this fine old town of Camden was the key between the North and the South."

"That is exactly so," remarked a gentleman whose acquaintance they had made at the inn. "It is safe to say that about where we stand was one of the pivotal points of the American Revolution."

Whereupon Jack groaned inwardly. Already, he declared, he had lost count of the pivotal points of the American Revolution. Every battleground they visited was the real pivot, in the judgment of its own especial students.

They had just returned from a delightful ride. Up and down the billowy land of this splendid, red-soiled, sand-hill region of the Carolina highlands they had driven, and had found themselves wonderfully drawn to the quiet, quaint up-country town, with its fine, run-down old mansions, its charming if exclusive old families, and its store of delightful old stories of two desolating wars. For here had galloped Tarleton's troopers, here had passed Sherman's veterans, and the track of each had been the trail of war.

They had heard all this as it came through Northern lips; but it lost nothing in the telling. Their companion in their ride had been a long-time winter resident of Camden from the North; one who knew and loved its people, its traditions, and its homes, but looked at them through practical eyes which saw alike the strength and weakness of the hero-stories that are the heritage of to-day. Besides this, he was, as you have heard, a careful student of both the battles fought in this alluring piny region.

“For there were two battles fought in Camden,” he explained. “The first one, they don’t talk much about ’round here. It was n’t exactly inspiring, even though it did serve its purpose as an experience, and though it did give a hero to history and a monument to Camden.”

“Who was that, please?” asked Marian.

“The Baron De Kalb,” was the answer, “one of the brave foreign officers who came over the seas to help fight the battles of freedom. He led the Continentals with the greatest valor in the first battle of Camden, and died a prisoner in the hands of the British.”

“That means, I suppose,” grumbled Jack, “that the British had everything their own way.”
An old-time South Carolina mansion of Revolutionary days, now standing on the road to Gum Swamp, or Sander's Creek, where was fought the first battle of Camden, August 16, 1780.

"They certainly did," their new acquaintance admitted, "though I will say that De Kalb tried hard not to let them. You see, it was this way: Gates was the victor of Saratoga—"

"Excuse me, sir," said Bert; "but we 've been to Saratoga. That was Schuyler's battle"; and all the five echoed vigorously, "Yes, sir; Schuyler's!"

"Whe-e-ew!" The gentleman gave a long whistle. "What a nest of partizans I 've got into!" he said. "But that's so; you're right. Only, for all practical purposes, Gates was the victor, because he was in command at the surrender. Well, the people sang his praises; Congress, in spite of itself, was forced to honor him; and, contrary to the advice of Washington, who wished Greene sent south in command, Gates was sent down here to conduct the Southern campaign."

"Well, how did he conduct it? As he did at Saratoga—come in and take the glory from some other fellow?" asked Jack.

"He didn't have the chance," said Uncle Tom. "He ruined himself by his blunders."

"That's so," their new acquaintance assented. "He bungled things from the beginning. As soon as he got south he started out to march on the British post here at Camden and surprise and capture it. But Cornwallis had 'sized him up,' as you boys say. He started in to surprise Gates. The surprise was mutual. The two armies came upon each other just beyond here, had a bit of a brush in the dark, and the next morning a regular battle."

"Whereabouts did they fight?" asked Bert.

"Four or five miles up this road," was the reply. "We'll drive there. They call it Gum Swamp."

"Excuse me," said Uncle Tom. "I thought the battle of Camden was on what they call Sander's Creek."

"Yes, so it was, pretty near it," their friend replied. "But the folks hereabouts speak of it only as the old battle-ground in Gum Swamp."

"Pepsin?" slyly suggested Jack to Roger.

"Too healthy," said the Boston boy.

Uncle Tom caught the aside.

"Not so far wrong, Roger," he said; "it was the gum that cured Gates of some of the indigestion of vainglory."

Their conductor laughed too. He rather enjoyed this group of merry, chaffing, but interested sight-seers. Then he went on:

"You see, the British position was between the creek and the swamp," he explained. "They rather had the best of it, and De Kalb suggested a retreat. He saw the danger. But Gates scorned the suggestion. Cornwallis, he was sure, would not dare to stand against the conqueror of Burgoyne. So the battle was joined."

"Were we whipped right off?" queried Jack, lugubriously.

"Well, yes — the most of us," their new friend admitted, smiling at Jack's unhappy interest. "The British, gallantly led, came charging on. The militia could not stand the shock; they broke and fled, carrying Gates with them. Two thirds of the army melted away. But the other third, the Continentals, led by the brave De Kalb, charged headlong upon the British left, broke through their line, wheeled about, and, standing at bay, fought the whole British army. Then De Kalb fell, pierced with eleven wounds, not thinking it possible that he had not won the day."

"Mighty mean that he did n't," said Jack.

"The odds were too big. He could n't," said Roger.

"Was n't he brave!" said Christine.

"Why did n't Gates stay and help him?" queried Marian.

"He was doing the John Gilpin act, I guess," said Jack.

"That 's just what he was doing," laughed their Northern friend. "He explained, afterward, that he was carried away with 'the torrent' of the militia and did not know of De Kalb's brave stand; but, whether this was so or not, it is a fact that he led the stampede on his big horse and never stopped until he reached Charlotte, in North Carolina, sixty miles away."

"Just think of it!" exclaimed Marian.

"Seven cannons, including some that Gates had captured at Saratoga, two thousand muskets, all the baggage, and a thousand prisoners were the price Congress paid for yielding to public clamor rather than following the advice of Washington," their host concluded.

"Well; did they change things?" Bert inquired.

"Speedily," was the reply. "General Greene, Washington's choice, was sent to the command of the southern army, and he and Cornwallis were at last fairly matched in Carolina."

"And then they fought the battle up there where our inn is?" asked Roger.
"Oh, no," said Uncle Tom; "several came in between; but we will go over that battle-ground while we are here."

They rode on, between green fields and past old mansions, to the battle-ground at Gum Swamp, as the Camden people call it. They saw the line beyond Sander's Creek, where the two armies drew up in battle array; they saw where the militia broke and fled, led on by "skedaddling" Gates; they saw, to the right of the swamp, the second position in the battle, where De Kalb broke through the British right, and fell, encircled by his foes.

Then they turned and rode back to Camden, loudly criticizing the stupidity that thus threw away a battle.

"When Washington lost he lost to win," said Bert. "That's where he was great, I say. Gates simply didn't know how, I guess."

Along the broad main street of the fine old town they rode, clear to the ancient ferry upon the Wateree, down the slope, and beyond the deserted churchyard.

Here, beside the yellow river, so their Northern friend told them, had been built the first Camden in the earliest days of settlement. Malaria and freshets, and the search for better fields for their crops, sent them higher up, and the second Camden was built among its broad fields of corn and cotton—the Camden of Revolutionary days.

"And all that is left to mark its site," he said, as they climbed the rise, "is this overgrown graveyard with its crumbling headstones and its tangle of vines and grasses. But it was a wealthy, busy, and beautiful old colonial town that stood here, a hundred years ago."

"Think of it!" said Marian.

"Not a thing left to mark the spot?" queried Bert.

"Not a stick or a stone," their friend replied. "Over there across that big cotton-field—let's see—can't you see a tree standing all alone in the lot—that small green one?"

They saw it as he pointed it out, above the springing cotton growth.
"Well, that marks the spot where stood the last historic mansion — the old Cornwallis house, as it was called," said their conductor, "because it was occupied by Cornwallis and the other British commanders as headquarters. It was burned when Sherman's March went through here in 1864, and, a few years ago, the last bricks and timbers were carted away and the site plowed over for a cotton-field—the same as the other old-time home-sites."

"Why," said Bert, "it's just like a whole village wiped out. What became of the people?"

"They built, up above, where it now stands, the Camden that you see to-day," was the answer. "Advantages of health and location drew the well-to-do planters and proprietors up to the sand-hills; the old houses were torn down or allowed to go to ruin; and now, where once stood the Camden of history, you see — farmlands."

"Why, it seems sad, does n't it?" said Christine. "It makes me think of Goldsmith's 'Deserted Village.'"

"That 's so," said Bert; "and see here, Christine; here 's the regular thing —

"'Near yonder copse where once the garden smiled,
And still where many a garden-flower grows wild,
There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
The village preacher's modest mansion rose.'"

Perhaps the minister's house was right here by this old graveyard."

"And see," cried Marian, "here 's the 'garden-flower' growing wild — and oh, see this old, old headstone almost buried in the grass!"

"Ah, you 've found' it have you, my dear," said their Camden companion; "that 's our romance of the Revolution."

At once all the young people were down before the old headstone, studying the inscription: "Here lies y' body of Agnes of Glasgow."

"Oh! who was she?" they asked.

"Who shall say? A camp-follower, perhaps,—a servant, maybe,—a fine lady, so some of the stories run, who followed her lover to America and died across his grave. No one knows," their friend answered. "This is all the story — this low headstone, almost lost in the rank grass, its inscription rudely scratched out afresh by some 'Old Mortality' of Camden. Just — 'Agnes of Glasgow.'"

The girls were not satisfied. They could not be interested even in the ruins of Tarleton's earthworks—a low ridge along the road, just beyond the old graveyard, and now crested with a row of stately pines. Indeed, all their way back to town they were weaving impossible romances for an almost impossible Agnes — "poor Agnes," they called her.
In the town, before the plain, pillared church, they stopped to read the inscriptions upon the old-fashioned shaft that rises to the memory of the brave De Kalb. It stood within the churchyard, just behind the gate.

"To De Kalb," it said; and beneath, on the southern face:

Here lie the remains of Baron De Kalb
a German by birth but in principles
a citizen of the world.

Upon the eastern face they read:

His love of liberty induced him to leave the Old World to aid the citizens of the New in their struggle for Independence. His distinguished talents and many virtues weighed with Congress to appoint him Major-General in the Revolutionary Army.

And on the western face, this:

He was second in command in the battle fought near Camden, on the 16th of August, 1780, between the British and Americans, and there nobly fell, covered with wounds, while gallantly performing deeds of valor in rallying the friends and opposing the enemies of his adopted country.

"In gratitude for his zeal and services the citizens of Camden have erected this monument," Jack read on the northern face. "Well, it tells the whole story, doesn't it?"

"Yes, and it seems about all we shall ever know of the brave German," said Uncle Tom. "His life is a mystery; but here, in Camden, he died like a brave man and a hero."

A few minutes later they were pulling up the hill beyond the woods toward the sightly old McRea mansion, and their Camden conductor told them that now—when they had turned off to the left,—they were upon the line of the second battle of Camden, better known as the battle of Hobkirk's Hill.

"As your uncle will show you when you cross the line," he told them,
"Greene and Cornwallis had been dodging each other up and down the Old North State. At last, outgeneraled and defeated, Cornwallis made a dash for the sea-coast, Greene hot in pursuit until ammunition failed. Then the American general changed his tactics and marched back this way into South Carolina, bent upon driving Lord Rawdon and his British force out of Camden. Rawdon was safely entrenched behind the earthworks we saw down by the old graveyard, you know."

"Yes, we know," said the girls, giving another thought to "poor Agnes."

"Greene," their friend went on, "halted on this side of the 'hogback'—that's what they call this sand-ridge, boys—known as Hobkirk's Hill. He encamped in that big field in the valley, and determined to await his expected artillery. This was on the twenty-fourth of April, 1781. That very night a good-for-nothing drummer-boy deserted and told Rawdon all about Greene and his army."

"The young villain!" said Jack.

"He may have been a friend of Curry, the deserter, Jack," Uncle Tom explained. "You remember he was the Charleston sergeant who deserted and told the British about the proposed attack on Savannah. The Americans got hold of Curry here and hanged him, I believe."

"Yes, but after the battle," their Camden authority replied. "He was among the prisoners, and the boys hanged him over yonder at Gum Swamp."

"They had good memories, eh?" said Jack.

"Is n't war dreadful, though?" said Christine.

"If you have heard of 'Tarleton's quarters,' my dear, since you have been here in South Carolina," their friend explained, "you will understand these deep hatreds and quick revenges."

"But all the same, it's dreadful," Christine persisted.

"Forward, march!" said Jack. "Never mind the sentiment. Let's get to the battle."

"Entirely Lord Rawdon's idea, Master Jack," said his friend. "Well, when he had the facts, at once he determined upon a surprise. Moving his force up the main road from Camden, he detached a large flanking force and sent it around by the road we have just come over. Right down yonder, in the hollow, these flankers came upon Greene's outposts. Let's go down and see where."

Leaving their big wagon, the party climbed the fence and descended the slope to where a clear running stream, a succession of spring-holes, and an artificial pond lay in the tree-bordered hollow.

"This particular spring-hole is called Greene's Spring," said their conductor, "because here some of the soldiers of Greene were making coffee for breakfast, while in the stream below others were washing their clothes, when the British surprised them. Up this hillside and over the ridge they fled, with the British after them, and had it not been for Greene's masterly arrangement of his encampment, the surprise might have been a rout. He speedily prepared for attack. The flanking party was driven off, and then, massing his men in the field, he led them up the slope—some going along the Camden road and others to the right and left—to meet the advance of Rawdon."

They drove along the ridge road, and came to where the Camden highway cuts through the high red banks of the "hogback" and runs down to the town.

"Up this road from the town came Rawdon," their battle-guide anounced; “here the Americans advanced toward him. Right through this cut they charged with a withering fire and drove the British back, beyond that clump of trees to the right and over the fields just back of our inn. All up and down this road the fight raged hotly. But, unfortunately, one of Greene’s commanders mistook his order and weakened the line. Rawdon, taking instant advantage of this error, brought up his reserves, swept up the hill, and broke the American line in confusion. To get his troops well in hand again, Greene reluctantly ordered a retreat, and fell back to the old battle-ground at Gum Swamp, five miles away, disappointed but whole.”

“A defeat again?” cried Jack.

“A reverse but not a defeat,” was the reply. “Rawdon did not pursue, but retired within his entrenchments and awaited developments and reinforcements. The latter did not come. Lee and Marion were coming to the aid of Greene; Rawdon judged discretion the better part of valor. He evacuated Camden; other points in the Carolinas were given up; and, in less than a month, the whole British force was retreating toward Charles-

PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. PRINCE LOUIS, BOSTON CAMERA CLUB.

THE BATTLE-FIELD OF HOBKIRK’S HILL, CAMDEN, S. C.
This road lies back of the inn at Camden, and is the same road up which Rawdon charged and Greene fought, below the “hogback,” at the second battle of Camden, known as the battle of Hobkirk’s Hill, April 25, 1781.
ton. Then the battle of Eutaw Springs, of which your uncle has told you, cleared the Carolinas and ended the British occupation. So much for Greene’s action here at Camden.

“Good enough!” cried Roger; “I was afraid it was to be another slump.”

“Not much!” Jack said, greatly relieved; “Greene was n’t Gates.”

“Indeed he was not,” Uncle Tom declared. “‘We’ll take another try at Camden in a day or two,’ he said, just after the battle. And to the French minister he wrote: ‘We fight, get beat, rise, and fight again.’”

“That’s the talk,” said Jack. “No wonder he came out on top.”

Yielding to the fascinations of Camden — its location, its surroundings, its delightful Northern company, its splendid horseback rides, its walks and its tramps through meadow, farmland, woodland, old estates and twisting country roads, our tourists lingered two more days before regretfully pushing on.

Then they took the noon train for a ride up the State to where Blacksburg sits among its mountains and its mines in the ore-bearing country of the Carolinas.

They rode out of Camden with the Wateree on their right, across the rice-lands flanked by towering pines. Then on, until rising higher, they ran across the sandy plateaus and through the famous Waxhaw settlements, where Andrew Jackson was born and first imbibed his hatred of England by his boyish experiences at the hands of Tarleton's rough-riders. They saw the place where, in the battle of Hanging Rock, the valiant Sumter first faced the British in victorious fight, and so at last they reached the mountain town of Blacksburg and its atmosphere of gold mines and engineering. For these Carolina hills, Uncle Tom assured them, have promising yields of ore and mineral.

The next day came a long, never-to-be-forgotten ride.

Over the hills they drove, until, out of the rolling plateau, rose sharp and sheer before them the famous sixteen-mile ridge, covered with its forest growth, known as King's Mountain, "because, I suppose," so Roger suggested, "it was n't the king's mountain very long."

"Indeed it was not," Uncle Tom remarked. "We are approaching, boys and girls," he continued, "the scene of one of the most dramatic episodes in American history. This rugged country is full of stern romances. From the days of John Sevier and Daniel Boone to those of the Confederate raiders and the 'moonshine' men, this land has been a region of peril and adventure. It is a land that still lies untouched in story, awaiting the pen of some wizard like Walter Scott to give its legends life. For such a one it is a mine with more 'pay rock' in it than all the Blacksburg cuttings."

"Try it on, Uncle Tom," suggested Marian.

"Thank you, no, my dear," her uncle replied. "I'm not anxious to go down in literary shipwreck. The mine would be spoiled unless a master-miner touched it. See here; all through this rough hill-country, stretching over into Tennessee, lived the sturdy highlanders — farmers, pioneers, and patriots of the border. When Gates was defeated at Camden, and all the country lay at the mercy of the British invader, the mountain men rose in wrath to the defense of their homes; they gathered under the command of their best leaders,— bold partizans all, Sevier and Campbell and Shelby and McDowell and Cleveland,— and swept over the mountains into this foothill section, where a famous and fearless British officer and rough-rider, Colonel Ferguson by name, with an army of regulars and Tories, was wasting the land.

"They drove him before them; they cooped him up in the hills; they 'treed' him on yonder mountain-top; they encircled his whole command with an unbroken ring of fire and of hate; then, closing in upon him, they killed or captured his entire force, and, their duty done, melted away as silently as they had gathered. But the terrible punishment they had visited upon the invaders was never forgotten by friend or foe in all the strife that swept these twin States. It was a rising of the clans, as vivid in its story as any rhymed in 'The Lady of the Lake'; it was the fiercest, most relentless, most dramatic, and most picturesque engagement of the whole American Revolution."

They climbed the ridge, they dropped into the valley, they rode through the far-reaching cotton-lands, they crossed the ford, they climbed the long, steep rise, they entered the timber-belt, and at last stood before the old monument, now almost obliterated by relic-hunters, which, years ago, the sons of the mountain men erected to the valor of their fathers.

But not alone did they go. For, when they stopped to get their bear-
ON THE SLOPE OF KING’S MOUNTAIN.
Here red-coat and Tory gave up in surrender, October 7, 1780.

ings on the ridge that faces the mountain, Mr. Hambright mounted his mule and followed them to the battle-field; Mr. Patterson climbed to the seat they readily made for him, and acted as guide and chief tradition-teller. And both these genial and courteous mountaineers were direct descendants of the gallant men who, on that October afternoon of 1780, encircled this rugged peak as with a band of iron, and crushed tyranny and Toryism in a terrible death-grip.

For these friendly cicerones every stone and tree and turning had its story. They showed the boys and girls the old monument by the roadside, erected in 1815 in memory of those who fell; they led the way up the path, pointing out the positions occupied by the several commands of the mountaineers as they drew in a great open circle about their foe; they indicated the site of Ferguson’s lofty camp, and of the headquarters hut from which he sent out his confident and blasphemous message to Cornwallis — that he was safe on King’s Mountain and the Almighty himself could n’t dislodge him; they showed the spot where Ferguson fell, fighting desperately and gallantly to the last, and the big round boulder beside which, wrapped in a bull’s hide, the daring leader was buried; they pointed out the knoll where, hedged about, the entrapped Tories were struck down by the victorious mountain-men,—neighbors and relatives, often,—in revenge for old crimes and feuds and cruelties, and where the gallant De Peyster of the New York loyalists hung out at last the white flag of surrender and gave up King’s Mountain and its camp and stores to the conquering pioneers.
And then they took their visitors to the loftiest point and stood them silently about the granite monument, thirty feet high, reared as a centennial landmark to the memory and the valor of the conquering clans, and inscribed with the names of those who, on this field of bloody victory, gave up their lives in defense of home and honor.

Bert read the inscriptions.

On the southwest face:

“In memory of the Patriotic Americans who participated in the Battle of King's Mountain this Monument is erected by their grateful Descendants.”

On the northwest face:

“Here on the seventh day of October, 1780, the British forces commanded by Colonel Patrick Ferguson were met and totally defeated by Campbell, Shelby, Williams, Cleveland, Sevier and their heroic followers from Virginia, the Carolinas and Tennessee.”

“Here the tide of battle turned in favor of the colonies.”

It was an interesting place, that battle-monument on a mountain-top. The young people lingered long about it, enjoying the extended view and listening to the stories and traditions of the place as told by these two grandchildren of the patriots themselves.

At last they turned their backs upon the spot, bade a warm good-by to their mountaineer friends, who gave them most generous invitations to their hospitable homes, and speeding over the country to the railway station of King's Mountain,—ten miles from the battle-ground,—took the train for Spartanburg and the country round about the Cowpens.

THE MONUMENT ON KING’S MOUNTAIN.
Erected by the people of North and South Carolina in memory of the patriots who fell in the battle on King’s Mountain.
"YANKEE DOODLE!" - INDEPENDENCE DAY IN GRANDFATHER'S TIME.
CHAPTER XII

IN A REGION OF RIVERS

The clouds hung low, like a fleecy blanket, about the long, broken top of the King's Mountain spur, as our travelers took the short ride down the railroad to Spartanburg. They had crossed the State line twice in their trip to the battle-field; for, though King's Mountain station is in North Carolina, the battle-field of King's Mountain is in South Carolina, ten miles and more away.

As they tried to locate the "whereabouts" of the famous fight, suddenly the clouds lifted for the moment and disclosed the sharp spur which, at the north, rises so abruptly from the plain that, as Jack observed, "it looks as if they were selling mountains around here at so much a yard, and that's where the yard ended—cut off short."

"It seems to be a sort of terminal moraine," Uncle Tom explained; "the end of a glacier, you know."

"Glacier, eh?" said Jack. "Perhaps that's what made it such a cold day for Ferguson and his Tories over there"; and it was at least a minute and a half before the girls could see the point of Jack's remark.

They left behind them the mining-plants and the new cotton-mills of Blacksburg—a rapidly developing industry in the prosperous cotton-belt—and crossed the Broad River, as muddy as it was wide, and true to its name in every way, as it slipped down from the hills between tall pine-forests and far-stretching cotton-fields.

The boys and girls enjoyed this leisurely travel in local trains for short distances. It gave them a chance to see folks, they declared. They were good at asking questions, though not so fresh as to be forward, and were ready to talk with those who had a word to say. Jack, indeed, liked to stand about the "Waiting-room for Colored People," which he found at every station, and was sure to get into conversation with some friendly old aunty or uncle, and imbibe much of the local news and tradition.

Gaffney was passed, so pretentious in its bustling importance that a tired child in the car, bound on a long ride North, raised the query: "Is this Washington?" much to our young friends' amusement.

At Thickety Station, Uncle Tom told them they were crossing the track of Morgan's and Tarleton's race for the Cowpens, where the battle was fought, and as they spanned the wooded cleft through which Thickety Creek breaks its way, he gave them the story of the battle of Cowpens.

"In the month of January, 1781," he began, "Cornwallis was in camp near Camden; Greene was but a few miles away. The British leader learned that the American general had been acting while he was resting, and had so placed Morgan with a goodly force of Continentals that both flanks of the British army, and all the small forts and posts that protected the rear, were in danger, either from Greene on the one flank or Morgan on the other."

"That was good work on Greene's part, was n't it?" said Roger.

"It was, indeed," Uncle Tom replied. "Greene was sleepless in his attempts to circumvent his adversary. If only he had been supplied with men enough, or those he had could have been depended upon, he could have settled Cornwallis speedily."

"Why could n't he?" asked Bert.

"Militia are always uncertain," Uncle Tom replied. "The Continentals, who had enlisted for three years, or for the war, could be made into soldiers, but the militia,—here to-day and gone to-morrow, while good fighters, many of them, were not to be depended upon in close quarters or in plans that needed time. Their term of service was always just expiring, greatly to the disgust of leaders who had plans—such as Washington and Greene.

"Well, to return. In this dilemma Cornwallis resolved upon immediate action. He himself, he said, would take 'Mister Greene' in hand, while Tarleton, with eleven hundred men, was to finish up Morgan."

"Sounds easy enough," said Jack.

"Tarleton came up with Morgan somewhere in this vicinity, and Morgan fell back, here, across Thickety Creek, hunting for a good position. He found it at last at the Cowpens."

"What under the sun does that mean, Uncle Tom—the Cowpens?" queried Marian.
"Just what it says, my dear—pens for cows," Uncle Tom replied. "The farmers all through this section, for years, had a way of sending their cows out to pasture under the oversight of some farmer who keeps salt in quantity—'salting cattle,' you know, is quite a necessity. Every once in a while this farmer would round up the cows in his charge, driving them into pens, or rail-built yards, where he would give them salt. These were cow-pens. Over yonder, between the Pacolet and the Broad rivers, there was just such a salting-place, owned by a farmer named Hanna. This was the famous Cowpens."

"And who got salted there, Uncle Tom?" Roger inquired. "Tarleton, I hope."

"Well, pretty nearly, Roger," Uncle Tom replied. "He was what you boys call a trifle previous. He was so anxious to get to work on Morgan that he would not wait until all his force was in hand. His line, you see, was a long one; it extended for miles, stringing along after the retreating Morgan. But when the Americans had gone into camp at farmer Hanna's cow-pens, their intrepid leader saw his opportunity. There he determined to make his stand."

"Was it such a good place?" asked Bert.

"Well, it was hardly such a position as a strategist would have selected," his uncle answered. "The river was at his back; his flanks were unprotected; the land was just suited for cavalry, in which Tarleton was strong."

"That does n't look very promising for victory," said Roger.

"No, but there was method in Morgan's madness," said Uncle Tom. "He was a fighter; he knew his men. 'With a river back of me,' he reasoned, 'my militia can't retreat. They'll just have to stay and fight it out.' And they did. Up came Tarleton, eager for the fray. It was the morning of January 17, 1781. But if he had expected to polish off Morgan at once he had reckoned without his host. Daniel Morgan was a general, in every sense of the word."

"Yes, I remember him at Saratoga," said Bert. "What did he do?"

"Just what he had meant to," Uncle Tom replied. "He fought just as he had planned. 'Hold up your heads, boys,' he said to his soldiers; 'three fires, three cheers, and a charge, and you are free.' And so it proved. As Tarleton came to the attack, the militia, as expected, fired and dropped back; the Continentals stood firm."

"'In their ragged regimentals Stood the old Continentals,
Yielding not'— that was the kind they were, eh, Uncle Tom?" broke in Jack.

"Yes," Uncle Tom nodded, "they had a good deal of the music of McMaster's 'Carmen Bellicosum' about them. At just the right moment they fell back on William Washington's cavalry—"

"Oh! he was there, was he?—the man with the silk-curtain standard," cried Jack.

"Yes, he was there, and proved himself, as usual, a splendid cavalry leader," responded Uncle Tom. "The British thought the Continentals were retreating, and made a great rush for victory. But about face, Continentals! ‘Give them one fire, and the victory is ours!’ cried Morgan. The fire rang out from the Continental ranks at close range. The British line reeled. ‘Charge!’ shouted Morgan; and into the swerving mass swung the bayonets of the Continentals. Tarleton’s dragoons refused to charge; Washington’s cavalry came on at a gallop. Down fell the red-coat infantry in death or surrender. Tarleton turned in flight with but a remnant of his force, and the battle of Cowpens was won."

"Good for Morgan!" cried Jack. "He knew how to fight 'em."

"He did, just, did n’t he?" exclaimed Roger enthusiastically. "Tarleton met his match that time."

"Morgan, you know, was a real soldier," said Uncle Tom. "You remember how skilfully he led his riflemen at Mill Creek, and how gallantly he fought at Breyman’s Hill, in the Saratoga fight. Tarleton had not struck many such leaders in his raiding about the Carolinas."

Evidently the republic echoes Uncle Tom’s opinion, and counts Morgan as a "real soldier"; for, in the public square in Spartanburg—in which enterprising little city our travelers were soon comfortably lodged—they saw a fine bronze statue of Daniel Morgan, more spirited even than the one in the great niche on the Saratoga monument. It was erected by order of Congress, to crown the column of Victory raised by the original thirteen States in commemoration of the battle of Cowpens.
"Why do they have it here?" asked Bert.

"What's the matter with having it on the battle-field?" queried Jack.

"Hardly safe," replied Uncle Tom. "It seems there was a shaft erected on the battle-field in 1856—an octagonal pillar built of shell concrete from Fort Moultrie, and supporting a fluted iron shaft capped with a ball and eagle. It was a neat, if old-fashioned, memorial, but it early fell a prey to vandal and relic-hunter, and to-day not a stone or scrap of it remains."

"What a shame!" exclaimed Marian.

"Human nature, my dear," Uncle Tom replied. "When people are arrested nowadays for chipping off bits of the splendid Washington Monument in Washington, or for cracking off snips of the Boston Public Library, how can you expect an unguarded memorial in the sparsely settled borderland between two southern States to stand untouched? At any rate, when a new monument was proposed, it was decided to put it in a safer place, and hence it rises in Morgan Square, here in this very live city of Spartanburg, seven miles from the battle-ground."

They walked leisurely from face to face of the fine monument, studying the inscriptions and "sizing up" the spirited figure of the old "Wagoner of the Alleghenies" as his men called him, because he had started in life as a teamster in the Virginia mountains.

"At a distance," said Roger, "he looks, perched away up there, like an old Greek warrior, from greave to helmet."

"A Spartan of Spartanburg, eh?" said Jack.

"That's good, Jack," said Bert; "but Roger's right; I thought it was some old Greek or Roman myself, when I saw it first."

"It's the costume, in outline, that gives it that effect," Uncle Tom explained. "There is n't much that's classic in a hunting-frock, leggings, and coon-skin cap. But up there it does have a sort of classic effect. Ward's statue is a good one, though. It is intrepid, aggressive, alert—the figure of the Virginia rifleman whose gallantry turned the tide at Saratoga and won the field of Cowpens."

On the main or east face of the pedestal Bert read aloud this general inscription:

"To the American Soldiers, who, on the Field of Cowpens, January 17, 1781, Fought victoriously for the Right of Self-Government and Civil Liberty. We enjoy the result of their toil and sacrifice, let us emulate their fortitude and virtue. This Column is erected by the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, Virginia, Georgia and South Carolina— the Old Thirteen States—and the State of Tennessee, 1881." [And below.] "The Unanimous Resolve of the Congress of the United States crowns this Memorial Column with the form and face of General Daniel Morgan, the hero of Cowpens, who, on that field, was victorious in the great cause of American Independence."

The next day they drove to the battle-field, across a fine rolling country, dark with pine forests, and green with cotton-fields destined, in time, to burst into fleecy white. By stream and field, across the brawling Pacolet, and on to the banks of the yet more pretentious Broad, catching glimpses of the distant cloudlike line of the Blue Ridge and the shorter uplift of historic King's Mountain, they rode along, until at last they came to Mr. Ezell's grazing-lands, and the rise above the Broad, on which was fought the plucky battle of Cowpens.

A slight hollow in the wooded elevation marks where the fight was fiercest, where Howard's Continentals, coming down from the river ridge, stood their ground and hurled back Tarleton's "infantry mob," charging across from the parallel ridge. Here, above them, William Washington's crimson flag had floated in victory as he tore through Tarleton's ranks; there, to the left, had Morgan stood when he cried: "Now turn and give 'em one more, boys!" Here the two "grasshoppers," or field-guns, first taken from Burgoyne at Saratoga, and then retaken by the British at Camden, were recovered by the Americans; and here, just on the rise, had stood the now vanished concrete pillar on which had been inscribed the sentiment that now appears on the new monument in Spartanburg:

"To the Victors of Cowpens! We enjoy the result of their struggle. Let us emulate the virtues which secured it."
It was all interesting, and Jack found himself, on that breezy hillside, leading his company in the "Banner Song of Cowpens," which they had found, and learned, in the judge's office in Spartanburg, the day before:

"Unfurl the glorious standard
Which at Eutaw shone so bright,
And as a dazzling meteor swept
Thro' the Cowpens deadly fight.
Sound, sound our lively bugles,
Let them pour their loudest blast,
Whilst we pledge both life and honor
To stand by it to the last."

And so on, with two more verses, and a vociferous and continuous chorus. It was stirring, at any rate, and they all enjoyed it greatly as they sang it out on the battle-field of Cowpens.

Next day they took up the line of march from lively Spartanburg and the sacred soil of South Carolina, bathed, so the Confederate general at Charleston had surprised them by the information, in the blood of one hundred and thirty-five engagements with the British in the American Revolution (Jack, himself, had seen the general's tabulated statement). They crossed the State line dividing the Carolinas, their iron trail threading the track over which now British and now American armies had advanced or retreated during the years of British occupation. As they ran into Charlotte, Uncle Tom reminded them that this old town was the goal in General Gate's sixty-mile gallop after his defeat at Camden. In this old town, he also told them, Cornwallis had settled down, to use it as a sort of headquarters and base of supplies; but he found the people openly unfriendly to England. Even the boys were full of fight. Or, as he put it, "Charlotte is an agreeable village, but in a 'blarsted' rebellious country."

"Did he say 'blarsted,' Uncle Tom? Honest, now, did he?" said Jack.

"Well—that's English, and that's what he meant," Uncle Tom replied.

"His lordship's language was not always choice, you know, and he found this North Carolina section so peppery with rebellion that he called it the 'hornets' nest.'"

"That's good! I hope they stung him," said Jack.

"They were capable of it," Uncle Tom responded. "We are in the heart of a Revolutionary region. Over yonder, just on the outskirts of Charlotte, stood old Mecklenburg, where, in May, 1775, the people of this section made the first Declaration of Independence. Further up the line, toward Greensboro, you run through such indications of old-time patriotism as Concord and Lexington, named for those foundation-stones of Revolution, and beyond Greensboro, near the railway at Graham, is old Alamance, where, so Carolinians claim, the first blood of the American Revolution was shed."
So, talking, resting, reading, and noting, they rode on to Greensboro, for that thriving North Carolina town was the nearest point of departure for the battle-field of Guilford Court House, some seven miles or so away; and Cowpens and Guilford Court House, so Uncle Tom told them, were direct stepping-stones to Yorktown. Cowpens, he assured them, threw the British on the defensive. Cornwallis, wishing to be unburdened in his quick marches so as to "fight light," burned his baggage and started after Morgan. That skilful general, however, dodged him, and speedily joined Greene, who, calling in all his scattered detachments, fell back, across stream after stream in this seamy region of rivers and creeks, and finally made a stand at Guilford Court House.

"To which place," added Uncle Tom, "we are bound this day."

Under the guidance of one who had studied this famous field from boyhood, inheriting the ardor of his father, the judge, who had given years to the "reconstruction" of the battle-ground of Guilford, our party drove along the ruddy Carolina roads, by field and forest, and cabin and cross-road, to where once stood the clustered building of Guilford Court House — long since disappeared, after busy Greensboro became the county town.

Their introduction to the battle-field was the stone slab at the corner of the cross-roads. "This granite slab," it said, "marks the southern limit of the battle-field."
"Why! it is like Concord," exclaimed Marian.

Indeed, they found it to be much like Lexington and Concord, as they drove slowly over the battle-ground reservation.

"It is the only real Revolutionary battle-park in existence," said Uncle Tom, "and as a monument of energy, patriotism, and pride is worthy of all praise."

Within a park of fifty acres of mingled pasture and woodland the Guilford Battle-Ground Company has carefully and conscientiously reclaimed from oblivion the famous field of conflict, and has made it an object-lesson in courage, patriotism, history, tradition, and endeavor.

The running fights of Lexington and Concord are illustrated by tablets; the extended field of Saratoga is dotted with memorials. But here at Guilford the line of battle has been carefully marked out by granite blocks; monuments and statues rise in their proper locations, marking some gallant stand of troops or the death-spot or rallying-ground of some intrepid leader; every tree and run and rock and vantage-ground that contributed to the story of Guilford has been noted and “ticketed,” while a large auditorium for patriotic gatherings, a museum of Revolutionary relics, an outlook, a keeper’s lodge, a railway station, a restaurant, and other appropriate and necessary accessories give opportunity for study, comfort, or pleasure to the visitors to this storied field.

Of course, our young people were delighted. Uncle Tom was enthusiastic, and the doctor, who acted as guide, was correspondingly happy. Appreciation of his father’s hobby was highly acceptable to him.

He took them everywhere. He outlined the whole battle. From the outlook platform they had a bird’s-eye view of the entire field—from the site of the old court-house, and the liberty tree to which Greene fastened his horse while he directed the fight, to the persimmon-tree on the further side of the field, beneath which Cornwallis’s big white horse was killed and he himself narrowly escaped capture. They roamed over the field, from the auditorium with its inspiring inscriptions to the Holt monument, where the last conflict took place. They drank from the Clyde spring, once red with the blood of heroes; they inspected all the monuments, read all the memorials, and visited the Hoskins house, which, riddled by bullets on that bright March day, still stands as a landmark of the fight.

Spot by spot, the doctor checked off the chief points of interest. “Here,” he told them, “fell Forbis, the brave North Carolina colonel who fired the first shot at Guilford; here Winston’s men withstood the last charge, retiring in good order; here, in the hollow, back of the Maryland monument, raged the fiercest fight, where Washington charged the Guards and Smith and Stuart met in a fatal sword-duel. Under that old white oak—"

“The very same?” asked Christine.

“The very same,” the doctor replied,—“Cornwallis gave the stern command to fire into and through his own lines as a last desperate resort, while the brave O’Hara hid his face in grief.”

“How dreadful!” cried Marian.

“Over yonder was the old bull-pen in which the American prisoners were confined; along the line of these granite markers ran the rail-fence where the Carolina riflemen met and hurled back the first onset; and there, across the field, far over by the liberty tree, Greene resolved not to sacrifice his army simply for glory, but to withdraw in time from a well-fought field on which the victor suffered more than the vanquished.”
"Then the battle was a defeat for our side, was it?" queried Jack. "I thought you said it was the decisive battle of the war."

"So it was," the doctor replied. "Retreat is n't always defeat. Without this battle it is probable that our independence would never have been won. That is why I claim that Guilford Court House was second to no battle of the Revolution in its results."

The boys and girls had heard this claim advanced in behalf of almost every battle-ground they had visited. They therefore did not respond heartily to the doctor's remark, although Jack and Bert were tempted to reply in a negative way. Uncle Tom, however, said musingly, "Let's go over the story again, and see if the doctor's claims can be allowed."

They stood beside the original battle-monument, its eight graduated courses of brownstone topped with a pyramid of cannon-balls, as Uncle Tom went swiftly over the story.

"Greene, pursued by Cornwallis, drew up, at bay, upon these rolling pastures flanked by forests. Cornwallis, boasting, but doubtful, accepted the American challenge to battle. Greene decided to use the same tactics as did Morgan at Cowpens; but he was facing quite a different antagonist. Cornwallis was a general; Tarleton was young and heedless. In three lines of battle, one behind the other, Greene placed his forces, with the command: 'Fire on 'em twice, boys, and then fall back.' On they came — the Hessians and the Highlanders, the Guards, the Grenadiers, and the Yägers, veteran fighters all. Crack! across the rail-fence there, where you see the line of granite blocks — went the rifles of the North Carolina riflemen. Lee, with his Legion, held the right in check. Again the North Carolina fire blazed out full at the still advancing enemy; then, obeying orders, the Carolina men turned and ran toward the Court House. The Virginia militia opened fire, standing firm in face of the British advance; then, they too dropped back, and the splendid old Continentals took up the fight. Back there, in the hollow behind the Museum and beside the spring, the clinch of battle came. The Continentals fired and charged. The British line broke, turned, and fled up the slope, the Americans pursuing closely.”

“Great!” cried Jack. “I tell you, our boys had learned how to fight, had n’t they?”

“It was the turning-point of the whole affair,” said Uncle Tom. “If only Greene had been supplied with fresh veterans instead of uncertain militia to send in to the support of his Continentals, he might have forestalled Washington in the capture of Cornwallis. But he had none, and to turn about and advance his whole line in support would have weakened his flanks. So he could not interfere. But Cornwallis did. As the Continentals and the Guards came together with a crash, while Washington’s cavalry charged in like a whirlwind where the brave Englishman Stuart stood stoutly at bay, Cornwallis saw that relief could only come by desperate measures. He ordered his artillery to fire straight in the face of his own struggling Guards as they strove with the Continentals below him.”

“Oh! I think that was horrible,” said Marian.

“War always is, my dear, as I have had occasion to say, and to repeat, many times on this trip,” Uncle Tom replied. “Desperate diseases require desperate remedies, you know. This one did — and the British army was saved. The artillery fire broke up the hand-to-hand fight; the American advance fell back; the British line re-formed, and charged, supported by the Highlanders, who had hurried up; Lee and his Legion were in another part of the field and could not support the Continentals; and Greene, feeling that he had sufficiently crippled the enemy, and knowing that he had not Continentals enough to withstand the British regulars, withdrew from the ground in good order.

THE Holt Monument.
Here the last stand was made by the Continentals against the Highlanders.
"The British held the field all night, but Cornwallis realized his weakened condition, and next day retreated in hot haste to the sea-coast, with Greene in full pursuit. Then, as you remember, Greene turned again; he fought at Camden—the second battle, called Hobkirk's Hill, you know—and at Eutaw Springs, and thus cleared the Carolinas of red-coats. So perhaps, you can see what the doctor means. Though a retreat, the battle of Guilford Court House was not a defeat. Victory really remained with Greene, and the British army was so crippled that, before winter came, it fell an easy prey to Washington at Yorktown."

"Well, that looks decisive," Bert admitted. "But see here, doctor, our independence would have been won just the same even if Cornwallis had cut Greene all to pieces on this spot."

"Perhaps so," replied the doctor, "but it is not probable. Suppose that Greene had surrendered or been destroyed here at Guilford. His was the last Continental army in the south. With that lost, the Carolinas would be lost. Cornwallis would have marched victoriously into Virginia, and communicated with the British fleets at Norfolk and New York. France would have dropped away from a losing cause; Washington, caught between Cornwallis and Clinton, would have been destroyed or driven far away; Congress would have scattered in flight. With their army and their government gone, the last hope of the colonies would have gone—and where is your independence then?"

"That's so," said Bert. "Big chance for Cornwallis, was n't it?"

"I 'll bet he felt bad," said Roger. And Jack said defiantly that he hoped he did.

"Where was Morgan all this time?" asked Roger.

"He, unfortunately, was very sick and had to keep out of the fight, greatly to his disgust," said the doctor.

"Well, he had done his part," said Uncle Tom; "for Cowpens gave strength to Guilford; and on this field, as these monuments and memorials testify, many heroes gave up their lives, and brave men, on both sides, here fought their last fight. See this!"

He turned toward the plain marble shaft in the hollow behind them, and on its southern face Marian read the inscription:

"Hon. Lieut. Colonel Stuart of the Second Battalion of the Queen's Guards was killed on this spot by Captain John Smith of the First Maryland Regiment. Erected by the Guilford Battle-Ground Company in honor of a brave foeman, 1895."

"That's the best thing here, I think," said Christine; "that and the crossed flags in the Museum."
And even the boys, even belligerent Jack, nodded assent. For they, too, had been impressed to see in the Schenck Museum on the battle-ground, above the relics and mementos of a bloody struggle, the crossed flags of the two contending people—the Union Jack of England, the Stars and Stripes of the United States.

So, standing beside the memorial to a gallant foeman, Jack leading, they all removed their hats in salute, while Bert spoke the hearty utterance of our greatest soldier and chief arbitrator: "‘Let us have peace!’"
THE ITINERARY.

This map shows the range of Revolutionary travel taken by Uncle Tom and his young companions, covering the ground from Lexington to Yorktown.
CHAPTER XIII

ON THE HEIGHTS ABOVE YORK

The Sun on the Monument—After Guilford—Marion's Men—Cornwallis at Bay—The French Alliance—The Last Assault—The Surrender—Old Yorktown—Home Again.

The storm came down upon them as the steamer ran into the broad mouth of the river. The shore-line vanished in the mist. The sea rolled dull and dark, with steely tinges here and there, or broke in a smother of foam about the cleaving prow. Now and then a belated duck, with a flutter of wings, rose from the surface to join a brief procession of other eleventh-hour ducks flying leisurely northward. An oysterman, headed for Norfolk, heeled over with the wind and vanished in the gloom; a dingy fisher-boat with a comfortable fare of shad dropped behind as the steamer forged ahead.

The day grew blacker; then the thunder broke, and a torrent of rain drove them helter-skelter into the abbreviated cabin on the upper deck.

Then, as suddenly, the thunder ceased; the clouds broke away; the blue appeared. The storm was over, and Uncle Tom, standing well forward, showed his young people the low, piny shore running up into meadows, the meadows into bluffs, and the broad and beautiful York River stretching far away before them.

Suddenly, on the high bluff to the left, the sun, breaking through a flying blanket of cloud, fell in startling brilliance upon a tall white shaft that rose high above everything else ashore—above ridge and roof, and the green tree-line that fringed the distant bluff. The low-lying clouds behind it served as a background for the slender shaft, the sun gleamed on its white surface and sparkled on the broad river flowing at its feet. There it stood, solitary, glorious, impressive—a landmark for miles of river-way, the beacon and delight of that whole quiet, sleepy shore.

The children knew it, now.
“The Surrender Monument!” they cried.
And so they came to Yorktown.
From the plains about Greensboro they had ridden all day over the old North State, bound for Norfolk and the sea. Across intersecting rivers, through farmlands green with growing crops, past cities, towns, and villages,—Durham sitting amid her tobacco factories and Raleigh with its State capitol—until, at sunset, they came to Norfolk, on the historic James.
They sailed down the river to the splendid roadstead, beside which rise the green-embrasured defenses of Fortress Monroe, and Old Point Comfort with its Capuan delights.
“For it is a Capua to us Hannibals and battle-scarred veterans,” Uncle Tom declared, as after a particularly delicious dinner at the big hotel he stretched his legs on the broad piazza flooded with electric lights, and vocal with the strains of the military band from the fort.
But Bert and Jack sternly censured their uncle’s lapse into laziness.
“Come, come, Uncle Tom,” cried Bert, who knew his Shakspere; “this will never do for a Continental and an old campaigner.

‘Look thou be true; do not give dalliance
Too much the rein.’”

“No, sir; no dalliance here,” said Jack. “We ’ve one more battle-field to do, you know.”
And so, next morning, they all embarked on the little river steamer for the trip by water around to historic and retired Yorktown.
In the intervals of the trip, and while storm-bound in the little cabin, Uncle Tom had led on the story from Guilford to Yorktown.

"Guilford, you know," he said, "though published by Cornwallis as a victory, was really, for him, a defeat."

"That's right! claim everything," exclaimed Jack. "I like his cheek!"

"Well— we were driven off, you know," said Bert.

"That's all right; say we were," retorted Jack. "But what was it the doctor told us that bright chap Fox — the friend of America, you know — said in the British Parliament? 'Another such victory will destroy the British army!' Huh! great victory, that was!"

"It really was n't much to brag of," Uncle Tom declared. "It left Cornwallis short of men, short of rations, and short of hope. He gave up trying to 'pacify' the Carolinas and made a bee-line for Wilmington, on the sea-coast, with Greene hot on his heels."

"Did they fight?" asked Roger.

"No battle," Uncle Tom replied. "Light-Horse Harry Lee kept pricking the British in the back as they ran; but after chasing Cornwallis over half the State, Greene turned in his tracks, and, as you remember, began to harry Lord Rawdon, and crowd out the rest of the British invaders."

"He was a soldier, was n't he — that Greene?" commented Jack.

"Indeed he was," Uncle Tom replied. "He had lost a battle, but he won the campaign."

"Good for him!" cried Roger.

"You know how he fought the battle at Hobkirk's Hill— near our inn in Camden," Uncle Tom continued. "You know how he fought the battle at Eutaw Springs, nearer to Charleston. Both of these were, apparently, British victories. But they were what you might call negative victories. The British held the field to be sure, but that was all they did; and at once they went scurrying off for security, behind the fortifications of Charleston and the sea-towns. Greene had really cleared the South of invaders, or cooped them up in close quarters. Do you wonder that the Savannah folks gave him a home and a statue, or that history places him high in military ability?"

"Fine, was n't he?" said Roger.
"What about his helpers?" asked Bert.
"They were excellent lieutenants—William Washington, Light-Horse Harry Lee, Marion, Morgan, Howard, Kosciusko, Kirkwood, Webster, and others as able and as brave. All honor is due to them," Uncle Tom declared; "for their energy and push and valor helped Greene to carry out his ends."

"Did n't they call Marion the 'Swamp Fox'?" asked Roger. "Was n't he a trump?"
And Jack declaimed to the steely sea:

"Our band is few, but true and tried,
Our leader frank and bold;
The British soldier trembles
When Marion's name is told."
Our fortress is the good greenwood,
Our tent the cypress-tree;
We know the forest round us,
As seamen know the sea;
We know its walls of thorny vines,
Its glades of reedy grass,
Its safe and silent islands
Within the dark morass.'

"And then, you know — let 's see, how does that other verse go?

" 'Well knows the fair and friendly moon
The band that Marion leads —
The glitter of their rifles,
The scampering of their steeds.
'T is life to guide the fiery barb
Across the moonlit plain;
'T is life to feel the night-wind
That lifts his tossing mane.
A moment in the British camp —
A moment — and away!
Back to the pathless forests,
Before the peep of day.'"

"That 's great!” cried Roger. “Would n’t you like to have been one of Marion’s men, boys?”

But Bert looked doubtful. Bert liked to have things very systematic and satisfactory.

“I don’t know; think of living in those swamps!” he said. “We 've seen 'em, you know. Ugh! no, thank you!”

Jack pooh-poohed loudly. “It reads well, anyhow,” he said.

“Yes,” said Uncle Tom, “it 's good for Bryant. But history does n't altogether agree with him. Marion's men were a’ rather hard lot, if we are to believe their own 'true and tried' leader. They were out for plunder quite as much as for patriotism, and Marion again and again asked Greene to let him go to the regular army at Philadelphia, or have a Continental command.”

“Well, they all played their parts, I suppose,” said Bert, “and so helped on to the end.”

“Yes, it takes all kinds to make up the total, you know,” responded Uncle Tom; “and it 's the total that counts. It was the total that drove Cornwallis to Wilmington, and finally into Virginia, where Lafayette — ' that boy,' as Cornwallis called him — was pluckily fighting the British invasion by Arnold and Phillips—formerly enemies at Saratoga, now comrades in destruction through all the fair land that lies off there, behind the storm.”

“Boy, eh? That’s what Cornwallis called Lafayette, did he?” said Jack. “Well, I like that!”

“How old was he, Uncle Tom?” asked Christine.

“Lafayette? Oh, about twenty-four,” answered Uncle Tom; “and as bright and plucky a young fellow as there was in the two hemispheres. He is the popular figure of our Revolution. From the day when, a boy of eighteen, he heard, while at dinner with the English ambassador, that the American colonies had declared their independence, to the day when he stormed the heights of Yorktown, he was one of the heroes of the conflict. And here, in Virginia, he made his mark, keeping up a brave resistance until the French fleet came sailing into these very waters, and the allied armies finished the war on these green heights above York.”

They landed at the darky-fringed wharf at the foot of the bluff, and, climbing the slope, stood at last before the splendid monument which the Congress of the United States erected in commemoration of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Cornwallis.

“Cornwallis, you see,” said Uncle Tom, “found that he could not get any reinforcements from Clinton in New York, who was afraid of Washington and the French. So he came here from Wilmington, fortified this bluff on the wide and deep river York, where he could have a fleet behind him, and again begged Clinton to send him more men.”

“And Clinton would n’t?”

“No, he did n’t dare,” said Uncle Tom. “But Washington gave him the slip, marched rapidly across country, and, joining his French allies, headed for Yorktown, where the French fleet was to come; then Clinton set sail also for the South, to relieve Cornwallis. But before he could get near here, all was over, and he went kiting back to New York.”

“Was there a battle fought here?” asked Marian.

“There was a siege and two or three assaults, but no battle,” her uncle replied. “The allied armies—Washington’s and Rochambeau’s—reached this place on the twenty-eighth of September, 1781. Here, where we stand, were the British intrenchments. At once the besiegers threw up what are called parallels—”

“What are they?—earthworks that run parallel to the enemy’s fortifications, I suppose,” said Bert.

“That’s it,” replied Uncle Tom. “The Americans made two, one in advance of the other, and thus got within three hundred yards of the British line. On the fourteenth of October, under orders from Lafayette, Alexander Hamilton led an assault on the British redoubt—we can find the remains of it perhaps, just down the hill there. Next day, the British made an unsuccessful sortie; that failing, Cornwallis tried to cut his way out and escape across the river to Gloucester—that treeless point on the further shore; but he was driven back by a storm, and that last resort failed."
Lafayette, dining with the British Ambassador at Paris, determines to go to the assistance of the American colonies.

"Poor man!" said Christine.

"Good enough for him!" retorted Jack. "Why do you say 'poor man!' Christine?"

"Oh," replied the girl, "I always feel sorry for anybody in trouble."
"Well, he was in it, sure enough," said Roger.

"He was, indeed," Uncle Tom responded. "And, with the clerk of the weather and fate both against him, he gave in at last. On the seventeenth of October one of his drummer-boys appeared on the ramparts and beat a parley. Arrangements were made for the surrender, and on the nineteenth day of October, 1781, at two o'clock in the afternoon, the British army marched out of the fortifications, with their drums beating the very suggestive air of 'The World Turned Upside Down,' and, on the plain just beyond that little church at the left, laid down their arms in surrender upon the heights above York."

"Hooray!" cried Jack. "Last act—ting-a-ling-ling! ring down the curtain."

"Author! author!" cried Bert, applauding vehemently for so "proper" a boy.

"Here stands his representative before you, stately and tall," said Uncle Tom, pointing at the Surrender Monument. "Or, perhaps I should say their representative; for the surrender at Yorktown was the work of the Americans and their allies — what we might call a work of collaboration. Read the inscriptions, now."

One by one they deciphered the elaborate inscriptions which box the four sides of the lofty shaft, as, encircled by stars, ringed by thirteen joyous female figures, and topped by a welcoming and victorious Liberty, it stands on that green bluff, a worthy memorial of a great historic event.

On the north side of the base Bert read:

"Erected in pursuance of a resolution of Congress adopted October 29, 1781, and an act of Congress approved June 7, 1880, to commemorate the victory by which the Independence of the United States of America was achieved."

"One hundred years in building," said Roger. "How was that, I wonder?"

"A good many things came in between," Uncle Tom replied. "It took the nation's centennial enthusiasm to put the work through, you see."

WITHIN THE WORKS AT YORKTOWN.
Washington just escaped a spent ball.
On the south side Marian read:

"At York, on October 19, 1781, after a siege of nineteen days, by 5,500 American and 7,000 French Troops of the Line, 3,500 Virginia Militia under command of General Thomas Nelson, and 36 French ships of war, Earl Cornwallis, Commander of the British Forces at York and Gloucester, surrendered his army, 7,251 officers and men, 840 seamen, 244 cannon and 24 standards to His Excellency, George Washington, Commander-in-chief of the Combined Forces of America and France, to His Excellency the Comte de Rochambeau, commanding the auxiliary Troops of His Most Christian Majesty in America, and to His Excellency the Comte de Grasse, Commanding in chief the Naval Army of France in Chesapeake."

Loud applause!
On the west side Jack read:

"The Treaty concluded February 6, 1778, between the United States of America and Louis XVI., King of France, declares the essential and direct end of the present defensive alliance is to maintain effectually the Liberty, Sovereignty and Independence, absolute and unlimited, of the said United States as well in matters of government as of commerce."

On the east side—"fronting the rising sun," Uncle Tom remarked—Roger read:

More applause, vociferous and repeated, at the close of which Christine, looking above the inscriptions, read upon the belt encircling the shaft at the feet of the joyous thirteen girls, typical of the enfranchised colonies, the immortal and inspiring words: "One country, one constitution, one destiny."

"Well, now! that's a fine one, is n't it?" exclaimed Bert, really at a loss for words before this splendid bit of history in stone.

"And is n't it a spot, though?" said Christine, looking all about her. The blue sky, the green bluff, the towering trees, the significant lines of softened ramparts (relics of two wars), the distant view of old roof-trees, the broad river flowing down below—all these, with the tall white shaft, and the crowding memories of the place, affected the girl, as it did all her companions, with a peculiar mingling of pleasure, pride, and patriotism; in which, if glorification also had a part, who shall criticize? In some places and at some moments it is not only allowable but justifiable to be a bit conceited. And, to an American, the Surrender Monument at Yorktown on a perfect spring day affords just the proper opportunity.

But to Christine came something else—a memory of her dear Whittier. And, standing there beside the memorial shaft, she recited his lines on Yorktown, as most nearly meeting her sentiments on the occasion:

"From Yorktown's ruins, ranked and still,
Two lines stretch far, o'er vale and hill.
Who curbs his steed at head of one?
Hark! the low murmur: Washington.
Who bends his keen, approving glance
Where, down the gorgeous line of France,
Shine brightly star and plume of snow?
Thou, too, art victor, Rochambeau!"
“The earth which bears this calm array
Shook with the war-charge yesterday,
Plowed deep with hurrying hoof and wheel,
Shot-sown and bladed thick with steel.
October's pale and noonday sun
Paled in the breath-smoke of the gun;
And down night's double darkness fell,
Like a dropped star, the blazing shell.

“Now all is hushed: the gleaming lines
Stand nerveless as the neighboring pines;
While through them, sullen, grim and slow,
The conquered hosts of England go.
O'Hara's brow belies his dress,
Gay Tarleton's troop ride bannerless.
Shout from thy fired and wasted homes —
Thy scourge, Virginia, captive comes.

“Nor thou alone: with one glad voice
Let all thy sister States rejoice;
Let Freedom, in whatever clime
She waits with sleepless eyes her time,
Shouting from cave and mountain-wood
Make glad her desert solitude,
While they who hunt her quail with fear—
The New World's chain lies broken here!”

“I tell you, Whittier always fetches it, does n't he?” said Jack, in whose eyes the mist of patriotic enthusiasm told how deeply the place and the poem thrilled the sometimes heedless, but always appreciative boy.

And they all responded "Yes."

They moved away from the Surrender Monument, and, skirting the brow of the bluff, hunted out the slight remains of the redoubts which young Alexander Hamilton and the Frenchman, de Deux Ponts, carried by assault in that last engagement of the Revolution. Then, passing around by the little church and its burying-ground, they saw beside the fence a short plain brown shaft, before which ap-
THE MONUMENT AT YORKTOWN.
This was the residence of the General Thomas Nelson whose name is on the Surrender Monument. In the bombardment of the British works he said: "Never mind my house. Knock it down."

peared the placard: “Spot where Cornwallis surrendered to Washington, October 19, 1781.”

“Oh! then this is the very real spot, is it?” cried Marian.

“So it would seem,” her uncle replied. “This little shaft of German cement, erected by the keeper of the monument in 1895, stands, it is claimed, upon the exact spot on which O’Hara gave to Lincoln his sword, in surrender.”
“German cement, eh?” soliloquized Jack. “Why not plaster of Paris? It was a French alliance, and not a German one.”

“Does sound just a bit Hessian for a Revolutionary monument; does n’t it?” said Roger.

“Don’t be ridiculous, boys,” broke in Marian. “I should think you would be just full of the scene here as it must have looked when Cornwallis gave up his sword to Washington.”

“Ah ha, missy-missy! where are your ears?” cried Jack.

“Did n’t you hear Uncle Tom say that O’Hara gave up his sword to Lincoln?” said Bert.

“Why, I thought it was Cornwallis and Washington,” said Marian, bewildered. “See, that’s what the sign says.”

“All signs fail in times of get-out,” said Jack, with one of his blundering attempts at quotation.

“You see,” said Uncle Tom, laughing with the rest at Jack’s remark, “Cornwallis had no desire to be the central figure in the show, so he said he was sick.”

“Well, I guess he was,” Roger observed with a significant shake of the head. “I am sure I would have been sick under the same circumstances.”

“And so he sent O’Hara as his representative, while Washington, equal to the occasion, had Lincoln represent him.”

“That’s right,” said Jack. “Could n’t get ahead of Washington, could he?”

“There is a story,” Uncle Tom remarked, “to the effect that there was a taste of Washingtonian justice in this. It seems that when General Lincoln surrendered to Clinton and Cornwallis at Charleston, you know, in 1780, the British commander turned Lincoln over to a subordinate, as if treating his surrender with contempt. So, at Yorktown, when O’Hara approached Washington with his sword, the general motioned him toward that same General Lincoln whom Cornwallis had humbled at Charleston.”

“That’s right, too,” said Jack emphatically.

“It does n’t seem quite like Washington, though,” Christine observed. “Why not?” asked Bert. “Washington was as just as he was good.”
"It gave him a first-class chance to get even with Cornwallis, too," said Jack.

"There are times, boys and girls," said Uncle Tom, "when lessons need to be taught. Washington knew just the right time to point his morals. And Yorktown was one."

"And here it all occurred," said Marian. "Well, I'm much obliged to both sides. Washington and Cornwallis showed great taste in selecting such a fine spot for their big closing scene."

They took a long and lingering look at the scene of the eventful surrender; and then they walked up and down the one disheveled street of the ragged old town—picturesque even in its poverty, with that tall white shaft rising above everything.

Conducted by a bright young girl, the daughter of the Northern owner of the mansion, they went through the old Nelson house, Cornwallis's headquarters during the siege, and a reminder of the days when Virginia hospitality was ample and regal. Here were the great rooms that had echoed to the tread of colonial aristocrats; here, before the wide doorway, stood the same laurel-tree from which was made the wreath presented to Lafayette on his visit to Yorktown in 1824; here, within and without, were reminders and relics of the two wars that had raged around this historic old mansion.

They saw the Moore house, just beyond the town—that fine old farmhouse in which were drawn up the terms of surrender—"the most important house in all America," its owner assured them; "for here," he declared, "a nation was born."

They saw the dark hole in the bluff, by the river shore, locally known as Cornwallis's Cave. Whether Cornwallis used it as a retreat or a wine-cellar really mattered little, Jack asserted, "for one thing is certain, Cornwallis's biggest cave was right on top of the bluff, there. Good point, eh, Uncle Tom?" he added; "bluff and cave both were tried by Cornwallis, right here."

Then, in the midst of laughter at Jack's final sally, the tourists turned their faces away from Yorktown, and drove along the pleasant roads of the beautiful York peninsula to Lee's Station, seven miles away, and were soon whizzing on by train to Richmond.

The battle-field pilgrimage was over. A short stay in beautiful Richmond, a delightful two days spent in revisiting old scenes in stately Washington, and then — home!

They were glad to rest after their repeated ramblings, and as they talked it over in what Bert called "executive session," they decided that it had been "simply great," an object-lesson in American history, American geography, and American patriotism, for which they were deeply grateful to Uncle Tom, whom they honored with the customary vote of thanks and, as he entered the room just then,—it was Mr. Dunlap's New York library, you know,—the Chautauqua salute.

Jack, for his part, declared that Washington was forever fixed in his estimation as a wise and great commander because he had always fought his battles in such beautiful parts of the country and within easy distance of first-class hotels.

"Of course, he did n't know it then, but we do to-day," said Jack.
"Think of Lexington Common and Harlem Heights and Prospect Park and our fine hotel in Philadelphia—which, you know, was within easy reach of four battles and a winter encampment! That's what I call working for posterity."

"That's all right, Jack," said Bert; "but I tell you, joking aside, the chief memory we've brought away from all these battle-fields is just—Washington! Is n't that so, Uncle Tom."

"I don't see how it can help being so," Uncle Tom replied. "From Cambridge Common to Yorktown, through six years and more of toil, of patience, of endurance, of rare generalship and unwavering faith, George Washington is the central figure of the American Revolution. He, beyond all others, carried its burdens; he, beyond all others, was its guiding and controlling spirit. Saratoga was as much his victory as Yorktown. He planned everything. His line was always the right one on which to fight it out. His fortitude, his nobility, his supreme unselfishness, his absolute belief in the justice and final triumph of the cause he led, stamp him not only as the patriot but as the man — worthy, indeed, the title given him, the grandest ever accorded by man to man, the 'Father of his country.'"

"And next to Washington," said Christine, "I think that the things that impressed me most were the crossed swords — the British and American — in the rooms of the Massachusetts Historical Society in Boston and the crossed flags at Guilford battle-ground. That means something, doesn't it, Uncle Tom?"

"It does, indeed, my dear," Uncle Tom replied. "It means peace, it means friendship, it means respect for brave foemen, veneration for gallant brothers; it means settlement of difficulties without the clash of sword or the boom of cannon; and, recognizing the same strain of blood that runs through the veins of Englishman and American, it means, from each side of the Atlantic, love and honor for what Mr. Gladstone called 'kin beyond the sea.' It means forgetfulness of old wrongs, old feuds and old hates. The time has come to forget them, though not to forget the heroism that sprang from them and made the republic. To-day, republic and empire should march shoulder to shoulder. For let me tell you, boys and girls, those crossed swords, those intermingled flags, mean, in my belief, the continued and triumphant progress of the English-speaking race, and while they mean recognition of bravery, while they mean glory for those heroes whose blood made our republic possible, they are also silent proposers of the mingled and fraternal sentiments: God bless the President of the United States, and God save the Queen!"

Whereupon the peripatetic five sang "America" to the tune of "God save the Queen," and then retired to dream of shaking hands with England on the battle-fields of the American Revolution.
INDEX.

Only the important names are entered here, and many like "Washington," "Cromwell," "Burney," etc., which occur constantly in the text are not entered at all. There are also slight allusions in the book to many persons and places which it has not been thought necessary to include in the Index, and the entries given generally refer to an important mention (or illustration) of the subject. When the treatment of a subject occupies an entire chapter, or a number of pages, the reference is to the first page only.

Adams, Samuel, 18.
Albany, N. Y., 158.
Alcott, Louisa M., 36, 53.
Allen, Ethan, 74.
André, Major John, 146.
Attucks, Crispus, 30.
Bennington, Vt., 164.
Birmingham Meeting-house, 120.
Boston Massacre, 30.
Bowling Green, New York City, 80.
Brandywine, Battle of, the, 115.
Buckman Tavern, Lexington, 24.
Bunker Hill, 55.
Cambridge, Mass., 1.
Camden, S. C., 103.
Carroll, Snkey, 31.
Chadd's Ford, Brandywine, 116.
Charleston, S. C., 176, 184.
Charlotte, N. C., 219.
Chester, Pa., 120.
Chey House, Germantown, 123.
Chew, Peggy, 126.
Concord, Mass., 35.
Cornwallis's house, Camden, S. C., 199.
Cowpens, The, 212.
Craige House, Cambridge, 5.
Dawes, William, 13.
DeKalb Monument, Camden, S. C., 211.
Delaware, Crossing the, 95.
Delaware River, 95.
Dillworthtown, Pa., 118.
Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., 148.
Dorchester Heights, Mass., 70.
"Dorothy Q.," 23.
Elmwood, the Home of Lowell, 8.
Emerson, Ralph Waldo, Home of, 43.
Emerson, Rev. William, 38, 44.
Ericson, Leif, 3.
Eutaw Springs, S. C., 188.
Fort Clinton, N. Y., 153.
Fort Lee, N. J., 92.
Fort Montgomery, N. Y., 153.
Fort Moultrie, 185.
Fort Sumter, 185.
Fort Ticonderoga, 74.
Fort Washington, N. Y., 92.
Freehold, N. J., 130.
Freeman's Farms, Battle of, 168.
Gates, General Horatio, Portrait of, 164.
Germantown, Pa., 122.
Gilder, Richard Watson, Lines by, 106.
Golden Hill, New York, 30.
Greene, Nathanael, Gen., Portrait of, 182.
Greeneborough, N. C., 221.
Guilford Court House, N. C., 221.
Hale, Edward Everett, Verses by, 50.
Hancock-Clark House, Lexington, 22.
Hancock, John, 22.
Harlem Heights, Battle of, 89.
Harvard University, 2.
Haverstraw, N. Y., 151.
Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 45.
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 7.
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Verses by, 7, 23, 32.
Hudson River, 139.
Irving, Washington, 149.
Jasper, Sergeant William, 178.
Jones House, Concord, 51.
Kennedy House, New York City, 78.
Kenneb Square, Pa., 119.
King's Chapel, Boston, 19.
King's Mountain, S. C., 206.
Lafayette Dining with the British Ambassador, 234.
Lafayette Wounded at Brandywine, 122.
Lee, Charles, 131.
Lexington, Mass., 17.
Livingston, Chancellor, 156.
Longfellow's Home, Cambridge, 5.
Longfellow Memorial, Cambridge, 61.
Longfellow, Verses by, 12, 58.
Long Island, Battle of, 81.
Louis XVI of France, 176.
Lowell, James Russell, Home of, 8.
Lowell, James Russell, Verses by, 8.
Marion, Gen. Francis, 232.
Marrett-Munroe House, Lexington, 27.
Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, 220.
Merriam's Corner, Concord, 48.
Minute-man, Statue of the, 42.
Monmouth, N. J., 130.
Morristown, N. J., 142.
Murray, Mrs. Robert, 87.
Newburgh, N. Y., 154.
Newport, R. I., 73.
New York, N. Y., 73.
Norumbega Tower, 4.
North Bridge, Concord, 40.
North Church, Boston, 13.
Old Manse, Concord, 44.
Oriskany, N. Y., Battle of, 160.
Otis, James, 31.
Philadelphia, Pa., 115.
Pitcher, Mollie, 132.
Pitt Monument, Charleston, S. C., 188.
Poland, Disembarkment of, 181.
Prescott, Dr. Samuel, 35.
Prescott, Col. William, Statue of, 60.
Pullski, 180.
Putnam, Gen. Israel, 62.
Quebec, 75.
Revere, Paul, 12, 56.
Rochambeau, 148.
Saratoga, N. Y., 159.
Savannah, Ga., 175.
Schuyler ville, N. Y., 159.
Schuykill River, 115.
Simms Statue, 190.
Sphinx, Mount Auburn Cemetery, 29.
Stark, Gen. John, 166.
St. Michael's Church, Charleston, S. C., 189.
Stony Point, N. Y., 151.
Sullivan's Island, S. C., 185.
Tappan, N. Y., 143.
Tarrytown, N. Y., 131.
Taylor, Bayard, 119.
Thoreau, 53.
Trenton, N. J., 102.
Trinity Church, New York City, 80, 138.
Valley Forge, Pa., 127.
Verplanck's Point, N. Y., 153.
Walden Pond, 53.
Wallace, N. Y., 164.
War, Gen. Artemas, 7.
Washington Elm, Cambridge, 11.
Wayside Inn, Sudbury, 57.
Wayside, The, Concord, 52.
Webster, Daniel, Oration at Bunker Hill, 66.
West Point, N. Y., 152.
White Plains, N. Y., 92, 143.
Whittier, J. G., Lines by, 239.
Wright Tavern, Concord, 49.
Yonkers, N. Y., 146.
Yorktown, 229.