The recent head-on collision on the oston and Maine Railway, in which twenty-five persons were killed and over a score injured, suggests that no matter how complete and adequate may be the mechanical safety devices of our railroads, the main reliance must still be on the human unit-th men who are entrusted with the actual peration. The wreck seems to have been due to an error made in sending rders, if the account of the acciden be correct. It is reported, according to such advices, that the conductor of the freight train was given to underreach a siding by the night operator at Canton receiving-acsuperintendent of the division—a copy of a telegraph order from the train dis patcher at Concord which confused the Against such emergencies the ner
