Saratoga Battlefield Gives Up
Many Relics from Uniforms and Weapons of Revolutionary Days

More than a century and a half after the Continental Army occupied the Saratoga battlefield, relic hunters have turned up many uniforms and weapons of revolutionary days. At least two score of relics have been found in the recent search, and in many places the relics hunters have been free to remove them without the slightest interference from anyone.

Some and a huge number of other military relics of particular interest are the remains of a Revolutionary War field hospital which was located near the site of the battle. These remnants, including a number of skeletons, were found in the same vicinity.

Among the objects exhibited in the Saratoga battlefield museum are several of these military relics. Among them is a sword and a bayonet, both of which were found in a grave near the site of the battle.

In addition to the title of "Patriot" of the American Revolution, the Saratoga Battlefield museum also displays a large number of other relics, including a number of skeletons, which were found in a grave near the site of the battle.

Many cannon balls are on display, which were fired during the battle. These cannon balls are of various sizes and were fired from different types of guns.

The museum also contains a number of old maps and documents, including a copy of the Declaration of Independence, which was signed by all the members of the Continental Congress.

The Saratoga Battlefield museum is open to the public and is located near the site of the battle.
